Carol (quadril, from its square shape, quarrée, through the Norman word carole), as an architectural term, is (1) a grille, cage, closure, or chancel; railings round the tombs of martyrs or persons of sanctity or importance; a screen of wood or metal, designed to preserve them from indiscreet devotion by pilgrims, and from injury by ignorant or mischievous visitors. They are frequently mentioned in the inventory of St. Paul's, London. The confession in the basilica was always fenced with a balustrade of this kind. (2) An enclosed study or reading-place in a cloister, used by the scribes or ordinary monks and regular canons. Carols of stone remain in the cloisters of Beaulieu, Melrose, and Gloucester, the south and west walks at Chester, the south and east walks at Worcester, and were in the south alley of Canterbury. At Durham there are three carols in each window; at Worcester apertures for communication remain between the recesses. In foreign monasteries they are usually placed in the little cloisters.

Caroli, Giovanni, an Italian Dominican, was born about 1425. In 1457 he received the degree of doctor of theology; was appointed dean of the theological faculty at Florence in 1459; and died there Feb. 1, 1503. He wrote, Expositio in Psalmos Graduales, in Psalmum cxxii et in Officium Defunctorum (Paris, 1477):—a number of biographies, published in Leandi Alberti De Viris Illustribus Ordinis Prædicatorum (Bologna, 1577). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 708; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Echard, De Scriptoribus Ordinis Dominicorum; Oudin, De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis. (B. P.)

Caroli, Pietro Francesco, a Piedmontese painter, was born at Turin in 1638. He studied architecture, geometry, and perspective; and visited Venice, Florence, and Rome, where his merit gained him admission to the Academy of St. Luke, of which he became professor. His subjects were the interior views of churches.

He died at Rome in 1716. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carolus, JOHANNES, a Belgian monk and historian, was born at Antwerp in 1526. He was a member of the grand council of Malines, an eminent jurist, a scholar and historian. He died at Malines in 1597, leaving Mémoires Historiques (published long after his death). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caron, an early Welsh saint, and patron of Fregaron, in Cardiganshire, is commemorated on March 5. See Rees, Welsh Saints, n. 306.

Caron, Augustin Pierre Paul, a French canonist, was born at Marseille-le-Petit, Oise, in 1776. He entered the congregation of St. Sulpice, where he taught the liturgical and ceremonial exercises. With abbot Gosselin he published several important works, among others, Œuvres Complètes de Bossuet et de Fénelon, accompanied with valuable notes. He died at Paris in 1851, leaving a number of articles published in L'Ami de la Religion; also, Manuel des Cérémonies à l'Usage de Paris (1847):—Notice sur les Anciens Rites de l'Eglise de Paris, a dissertation full of interesting research. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caron, Raymond, an Irish theologian, was born in the county of Westmeath in 1605. He entered the order of the Recollets, and studied at Salzburg and Louvain; returned to his country as commissary-general of his order; emigrated when the Puritans were in power; returned at the Restoration, in 1660; and died at Dublin in 1666. He wrote several works, especially, Remonstrantia Hybernorum contra Lovanienses Ultramontanæque Censuras, etc. (Lond. 1665, fol.):—Roma Triumphans (Antwerp, 1635):—Apostolatus Evangelium Missionarium (1653):—Controversiæ Generalis Fidei (1660):—Loyalty Asserted and the Late Remonstrance or Allegiance of the Irish Clergy and Laity Confirmed (Lond. eod. 4to):—A Vindication of the Roman Catholics of the English Nation (ibid. eod. 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Carondelet (POTTELES), Albert Charles Dominique, a French ecclesiastic and antiquarian, was born Oct. 16, 1761. He became a priest in early life, and was elected jurist of the chapter of Cambrai, June 11, 1784. He travelled abroad, making historical researches in Flanders, Hainault, and Cambresis, and died at Quiesry, Jan. 20, 1833, leaving some very interesting papers on those provinces. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carondelet, Jean de, a prelate and magistrate of Burgundy, was born at Dôle in 1469. He was successively dean of the metropolitan church of Besançon, abbot of Mont-Benoit, provost of Saints-Donatien of Bruges, and, in 1503, ecclesiastical member of the sovereign council of Malines. Carondelet was very highly esteemed by Charles V, who, in 1527, appointed him perpetual president of the council of Brussels, and in 1531 made him president of the privy council of the Netherlands. He was afterwards appointed archbishop of Palermo, and primate of Sicily. He was obliged, in 1540, on account of age and infirmities, to retire to private life, and died at Malines, Feb. 8, 1544, leaving In Orbis Situ (Antwerp, 1565), and several manuscripts upon various questions of law. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caroselli, ANGIOLO, an Italian painter, was born at Rome in 1585, and studied under M. A. Caravaggio. He died in 1653. His large works in the churches are The Martyrdom of St. Placidus and St. Gregory (debrating Mass, in Santa Francesca Romana; also St. Immacolato, in the pontifical palace of the Quirinal. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carossa was the traditional name of Manes's mother, cursed in the anathemas which converts from Manichæanism had to subscribe before they were admitted into the Church. See Beausobre, Hist. Manich. i, 67.

Carōsus. (1) See CATULINUS. (2) One of the Illyrian bishops addressed by Leo the Great (Epist. 13, p. 677), in the consulship of Aetius and Symmachus. (3) Eutychian abbot, whom Leo begs the emperor Marcian to silence (Epist. 136, p. 281), and who was accordingly turned out of his monastery (Epist. 142, p. 1297).

Carothers, Andrew G., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Washington, D.C., in 1827. He was educated at Columbian College, Washington, and preached at Worcester, N. Y., for five years; but in 1839 removed to Ohio and ministered at Litchfield. He died Oct. 20, 1862. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1863, p. 290.

Carothers, Robert, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Turtle Creek, Pa., in October, 1831. He entered Eldridge Academy in 1850, and in 1852 Jefferson College, graduating in 1854, and afterwards at the Western Theological Seminary. He was licensed and ordained by the Presbytery of Blairsville; commenced his labors at Henry, Ill., and afterwards preached at Millersburg, O. In 1860 he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Tipton, Ia., where he remained eight years. His next field of labor was Cross Roads, Pa., where he continued in charge until he was elected principal of the Iowa College for the Blind, at Vinton, in 1877. He filled all the offices committed to his trust with the greatest integrity, but his work in the College for the Blind was the greatest of his life. He died at Vinton, March 17, 1882. (W. P. S.)

Carotto (or Caroto), GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, an Italian painter, was born at Verona in 1470, and studied under Liberale Veronese and Mantegna. His chief works are, St. Fermo, at Verona, and the altar-piece of the Angels, in Santa Eufemia. He died in 1546. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carové, FRIEDRICH WILHELM, a Roman Catholic writer of Germany, was born at Coblenz, June 20, 1789. He studied law and practiced for some time. In 1815 he went to Heidelberg, where he devoted himself, under the guidance of Hegel, to philosophical studies. In 1818 he followed Hegel to Berlin, and in 1819 commenced his lectures at Breslau as privat-docent. His political views made it necessary for him to change his residence, and he died at Heidelberg, March 18, 1852. He wrote, Ueber d. Auctorität der alleinseligmachenden Kirche (Frankfort, 1825, 2 vols.; 2d ed. Hanau, 1835):—Was heisst römisch-katholische Kirche? (2d ed. Altenburg, 1847):—Der Saint-Simonismus und die neuere französische Philosophie (Leips. 1831):—Ueber das Cölibatgesetz der römisch-katholischen Clerus (1832, 2 vols.):—Ueber kirchliches Christenthum (1835):—Papismus und Humanität (1838):—Vorhalle des Christenthums oder die letzten Dinge der alten Welt (Jena, 1851). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 215, Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. (see Index). (B. P.)

Carpaccio, Benedetto, an Italian painter, probably the son or nephew of Vittore, painted a picture in 1537, in the church of the Rotonda, at Capo d'Istria, representing the Coronation of the Virgin. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carpaccio (called also Scarpaccia or Scarpazza), Vittore, a Venetian painter, was born about 1450, and died about 1522. He painted several pictures, in competition with the Bellini, for the churches and public edifices at Venice. There is a picture by him at Ferrara, in Santa Maria del Vado, of the Death of the Virgin. His principal work was destroyed by fire in 1576. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Carpagna, GASPARO, an Italian cardinal, theologian, and numismatologist, who lived in the latter half of the 17th century, wrote, Epistola Pastoralis, in the series of Carlo Borromeo:—Instructiones Pastorum (Louvain, 1702; Rouen, 1707). But Carpagna is better known as the collector of a cabinet of coins and medals, a catalogue and description of which is attributed to Bellori, entitled, Scelta de' Medaglioni più rari nella Biblioteca dell' Eminentissim. Signor Cardinale Gasparo Carpagna (Rome, 1679). Another description was published under a different title, at Amsterdam, in 1685. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carpani, GIUSEPPE, an Italian theologian and poet, was born at Rome, May 2, 1683. He joined the Jesuits, taught rhetoric, philosophy, and theology at the Germanic college of Rome, and died there about 1765, leaving seven Tragedies in Latin verse (Vienna, 1746; Rome, 1750):—De Jesu Infante (Rome, 1747); both works are published under his academic name, Tirro Ercopolia:—some Latin poems inserted in Arcadium Curmina (ibid. 1757). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carpano, PIETRO VICENTE, an Italian scholar and sacred orator, a native of Milan, lived in the early half of the 17th century. He was secular priest and director of the seminary of Brescia, where he taught eloquence. He wrote, De Ratione Scribendi Epistolas Scholæ Priores (Brescia, 1613):—Christus Nascens, Christus Circumciscus, Poemata (Genoa, 1625):—Della Forma che deve Tenerli nelle Crie (without date or place of publication):—Elogia Sacra:—Lacrymæ de Christi Domini Cruciatibus et nece, Poema:—many Latin letters in the Epistolæ Sanazarrii, Succi et Farnesii (Milan, 1621). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carpenter, Alfred G., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in South Carolina, Aug. 1, 1837. He professed religion at the age of fourteen; became careless afterwards, but was reclaimed when about eighteen; labored from that time as exhorter and Sunday-school superintendent till 1862, when he was licensed to preach, and, after serving the Church six years as local preacher, he entered the North Georgia Conference, wherein he labored until his death, Sept. 30, 1871. Mr. Carpenter was characterized by great faith, exemplary piety, and a prayerful life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1871, p. 549.

Carpenter, Burton, a Baptist minister, was born at Monkton, Vt., March 5, 1785. He was ordained in 1816, in Schoharie County, N. Y., where he was a useful and successful pastor for nearly a third of a century. In 1838 he removed to the West, on account of ill-health, but was able to preach but little afterwards, and died at Grand Detour, Ogle Co., Ill., July 3, 1849. See Minutes of Ill. Anniversaries, 1849, p. 5. (J. C. S.)

Carpenter, Charles, an English Baptist minister, was born at Alsford, Hants, in 1796. He was converted in his youth, and baptized at Folkestone, Kent. He established the first Baptist chapel at Dover, and afterwards removed to Rochester, where he gathered a new church and was its pastor for four years. He next settled in London for sixteen years, then spent three years in Wales, and finally located at Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk, where he died, March 24, 1858.

Carpenter, Chester Whitmore, a Congregational minister, was born at Ashford, Conn., Aug. 8, 1812. He graduated at Amherst College in 1839, and at the Connecticut Theological Institute in 1844. He taught one year in Pittsfield, Mass., and was ordained at Sinclairville, N. Y., Sept. 25, 1845. After preaching some time, he went South for the benefit of his health; and while on his return died, April 17, 1867. See Hist. Catalogue of Conn. Theolog. Ins. p. 40. (J. C. S.)

Carpenter, Cyrus Evans, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Carroll County, Ind., April 2, 1838. He removed with his father's family to Iowa in 1850; was converted in 1852; made a class-leader in 1857; received license to preach in 1858, and in 1859 united with the Missouri and Arkansas Conference. He was stationed on the western frontier, but the intolerance of the secessionists at the opening of the rebellion necessitated his leaving, and he fled to Kansas, where he remained a short time, then went to Iowa, and in the spring of 1862 returned to Missouri. He continued his zealous labors till early in 1867, when failing health obliged him to become superannuated, and, retiring to Fairfield, Ia., he died there, May 21 of that year. Mr. Carpenter was a worthy man, enjoying the confidence and esteem of all classes; an able preacher, a sound theologian, a good singer, an amiable companion, and a Christian gentleman. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 21.

Carpenter, Eber, a Congregational minister, was born in Vernon, Conn., June 24, 1800. He graduated at Yale College in 1825, and then taught for some time at Norwalk. For two years he studied theology at Andover, Mass., and was licensed to preach, in 1828, by the Londonderry Presbytery, N. H. He labored as a missionary in Waterville, Me., and also at Woonsocket, R. I. From 1830 to 1835 he was regular pastor in York, Me. In December of the latter year he was installed over the Congregational Church in Southbridge, Mass. His health failing, in October, 1853, he obtained leave of absence from his charge, in order to conduct The American National Preacher. In March, 1857, he resumed his pastoral labors in the Southbridge Church, and remained there until July, 1864. The last three years of his life were spent in Boston, where he preached occasionally. He had accepted a unanimous call to the church in North Falmouth, but died in Boston, Oct. 21, 1867. See Cong. Quarterly, 1871, p. 71.

Carpenter, Erasmus Irvin, a Congregational minister, was born at Waterford, Vt., April 29, 1808. He received his preparatory education at Peacham Academy; graduated at the University of Vermont in 1837, and was one year (1841) at Andover. He was ordained at Littleton, N. H., Dec. 13, 1842; was installed at Barre, Vt., Dec. 25, 1857; and March 6, 1867, became acting-pastor at Berlin. In 1869 he removed to White River Junction, and was appointed agent of the Vermont Bible Society. He became acting pastor at Swanzev, N. H., in 1874; and died Feb. 10, 1877. (W. P. S.)

Carpenter, Ezra, a Unitarian minister, was born at Rehoboth, Mass., in 1702. He graduated at Harvard College in 1720; was ordained pastor at Hull, Nov. 24, 1728, installed at Keene, N. H., Oct. 4, 1758; dismissed March 6, 1769; and died Oct. 26, 1785. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 3.

Carpenter, Ezra Greenwood, a Congregational minister, was born at Potsdam, N. Y., Dec. 20, 1829. He studied at St. Lawrence Academy, then a few months in Chicago Theological Seminary, and privately in Minnesota. He was ordained evangelist at Maiden Rock, Wis., Dec. 30, 1868; was acting pastor there, 1867-70; at Grand Rapids, 1870-72; at Corning, Ia., 1872-74; installed at Stuart, Aug. 22, 1874; resigned March 17, 1875; was acting pastor at Winthrop, 1875-76; at Golden Prairie, 1877; and died Aug. 25, 1879. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 15.

Carpenter, George, an English martyr, resident at Emmerich, in Bavaria, was brought before the council for the following offences: (1) He did not believe that a priest could forgive sins; (2) he did not believe that a man could call God out of heaven; (3) he did not believe that God was in the bread which the priest places over the altar, but that it was the bread of the Lord; (4) he did not believe that the water itself, in baptism, could bestow grace. He utterly refused to recant, and was burned in 1527. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 374.

Carpenter, John (1), an English prelate of the 15th century, was born at Westbury, Gloucestershire. He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford; became provost and chancellor of the university there; was preferred prebend of St. Anthony's, London, and at last became bishop of Worcester. He died in 1475. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 555.

Carpenter, John (2), an English theologian, was born in Cornwall, and died in 1620, leaving Sermons, Meditations, etc. (Lond. 1588). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carpenter, John (3), D.D., an Irish prelate, was born in Chancery Lane, Dublin, and was educated in the university at Lisbon. On his return to his native city he was appointed curate in St. Mary's parish chapel. He was consecrated to the see of Dublin, June 3, 1770, by the Catholic primate, assisted by several others. In November, 1778, Carpenter, at the head of seventy of his clergy, and several hundred Roman Catholic laity, attended at the court of the king's bench in Dublin, and took the oaths prescribed by the act for the relief of Roman Catholics in that kingdom. He died Oct. 29, 1786. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Abps. of Dublin, p. 472.

Carpenter, Lucien Bonaparte, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Derby, Vt., July 4, 1839. He was a precocious youth; secured for himself a private collegiate education; removed to Springfield, Ill., at the age of seventeen; taught school, and prepared to study law, but, on experiencing religion, in 1858, became an earnest Christian worker; received license to preach, and in the same year entered the Illinois Conference. His appointments were Exeter, Petersburg, Carrollton, Beardstown, Hillsborough, and Stapp's Chapel, Decatur; in 1870 he received a transfer to the Indiana Conference, wherein he was stationed three years at Trinity, Evansville; was transferred to the Virginia Conference in 1873, and appointed to Fourth Street, Wheeling; and in 1874 was transferred to the Baltimore Conference, in which he was stationed for three successive years as pastor of Grace Church; in 1877 and 1878 of Exeter Street Church, and in 1879 of Jackson Square Church, Baltimore, where he died suddenly, Nov. 20, 1879. Mr. Carpenter's pulpit ministrations always attracted a throng of admiring listeners. He was passionately fond of study, a brilliant orator, and an advanced thinker. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 15.

Carpenter, Mark, a Baptist minister, was born at Guilford, Vt., Sept. 23, 1802. He pursued his studies in part at Amherst College, and graduated at Union College in 1829, and from the Newton Institution in 1833. He was ordained at Milford, N. H., Feb. 12, 1834, and six years afterwards accepted a call to Keene, remaining there about five years. He was pastor from 1846 to 1850 at New London, N. H.; from 1851 to 1861 at Holyoke, Mass.; at Brattleboro, Vt., from 1861 to 1867; at West Dummerston, from 1867 to 1869; South Windham, from 1869 to 1874, whence he removed to Townshend, and died there, Nov. 13, 1882. He was one of the oldest and best-known ministers in the state of Vermont. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 185. (J. C. S.)

Carpenter, Mary, an English philanthropist, was born Aug. 18, 1807, at Bristol. At a very early age she took an active part in that social movement which had for its object the amelioration of the condition of the lower classes, the reorganization of prisons, and caring for homeless children. To this end she originated the system of reformatory schools and such institutions as had her cherished object in view, and by word and deed she interested the community at large. She took an active part in the annual meetings of the "British Association for the Promotion of Social Science," and even undertook a voyage to India for philanthropic purposes in 1866-67, the results of which she published in Suggestions on Prison Discipline and Female Education in India (1867); and Six Months in India (1868, 2 vols.).

For a further advance of prison reform and female education, she visited India three times between 1868 and 1876. The results of her last journey she communicated to lord Salisbury, secretary for India, who brought them in an official form before Parliament. Miss Carpenter died at Bristol, June 14, 1877. She wrote Morning and Evening Meditations for Every Day in the Year (1842):—Reformatory Schools for Children (1851):—Juvenile Delinquents, their Condition and Treatment (1853):—Our Convicts (1864, 2 vols.). See Brockhaus, Conversations-Lexikon (13th ed. 1882), s. v.; Carpenter, The Life and Work of Mary Carpenter (Lond. 1879, 1881). (B. P.)

Carpenter, Nathaniel, an English clergyman, was born in Devonshire in 1588, and educated at St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford. About 1626 he became acquainted with archbishop Usher, then at Oxford, who admired his talents, and took him to Ireland, where he made him one of his chaplains. Soon after this Carpenter was advanced to a deanery. He died at Dublin, according to Wood, in 1628; according to Fuller, in 1635. His publications include Philosophia Libera, etc. (1621), memorable as one of the first attacks upon the Aristotelian philosophy:—Geographie Delineated (1625):—and several Sermons. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Carpenter, Richard (1), an English divine, was a native of Cornwall, and was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow in 1596. In 1611 he was admitted to orders; and about that time was made rector of Sherwell, and of Loxhore, adjoining, in Devonshire; and afterwards obtained the benefice of Ham, near Sherwell. He died Dec. 18, 1627, aged fifty-two. He published several single Sermons. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Carpenter, Richard (2), D.D., an English divine and poet of the 17th century, was educated at Eton College, and at King's College, Cambridge. About 1625 he left England, and studied in Flanders, France, Spain, and Italy; and at length received holy orders at Rome from the hands of the pope's substitute. He entered the order of St. Benedict, and was sent to England to make proselytes; but in little more than a year he returned to the Protestant communion, and obtained the vicarage of Poling, in Sussex. In the time of the civil war, however, he retired to Paris, and reconciled himself to the Romish Church. He afterwards returned to England, and settled at Aylesbury, where he obtained a curacy. He was living there in 1670, but, before his death, returned a third time to Romanism. He published, Experience, History, and Divinity (1642):—Astronomy Proved Harmless, Pious, Useful (1663):—Rome in her Fruits (ed.):—The Pragmatical Jesuit new Learned; and other works. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Carpenter, Robert Wright, an English Congregational minister, was born at Taunton, July 5, 1831. He joined the Church in his boyhood; received his ministerial training at Hackney College; and, at the close of his college course, became co-pastor at Portsea. He commenced his ministry there in 1858; removed to Devonport in 1861, to Woolwich in 1869, and finally retired to Bexley Heath, and died there, May 15, 1872. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1872, p. 307.

Carpenter, Samuel T., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Ohio, was rector of the Church in Smyrna, Del., in 1853, and remained there for several years. Subsequently he removed to Monroe, Mich., as rector; in 1859 he became rector of Trinity Church, Polo, Ill.; and in 1864 he was appointed chaplain in the United States Hospital at Cincinnati, O. He died Dec. 26, 1864. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1866, p. 98.

Carpenter, Sarah, wife of Zeno Carpenter, was an elder, for many years, of the Society of Friends (Orthodox), and was also a member of Bridgewater Monthly Meeting. She died Dec. 16, 1835, in Utica, N. Y., aged sixty-two years. See The Friend, ix, 112.

Carpenter, William, a Lutheran minister, was born near Madison, Va., May 20, 1762. He served as a soldier in the Revolutionary war up to its close. While there he felt called to preach. He took a course of theology, and was licensed, by the Synod of Pennsylvania, in 1787. His first field of labor was in Madison County, Va., where he continued twenty-six years. He removed to the West in 1813, and entered upon his second and last charge in Boone County, Ky. Here he preached for twenty years, and died Feb. 18, 1833. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ix, 1, 84.

Carpentras, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Carpentoracense), was held in 527, Cæsarius of Arles presiding, at the head of sixteen bishops. They published but one canon, which forbids the bishop to take anything from the parishes within his diocese, provided he has a sufficient revenue for his maintenance. In this council, also, Agreus, bishop of Antibes, was suspended during a year for conferring orders contrary to the canons. See Labbe, Concil. iv, 1663.

Carper, Joseph, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Pendleton County, Va., in 1789. He passed his early years on a farm; received a very limited education; was converted in his youth; but spent his early manhood in the army. His religious convictions returning, however, he received license to preach, and in 1816 entered the Baltimore Conference. In 1819 he was transferred to the Ohio Conference. Between 1837 and 1840 Mr. Carper held a local relation. He then re-entered the effective ranks and served until 1848, when he again located, but continued to preach until 1855, when he became superannuated. He died Aug. 27, 1867. Mr. Carper was capable of great physical endurance; had a strong, clear voice; a logical, rhetorical, practical mind; a pathetic manner of delivery; an ardent spirit, and a soul full of devotion. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 257.

Carphacasemeðcheir (Καρφακασμεοχείρ) was one of the heavenly powers in the system of the Peratæ (q. v.).

Carpi (or de Carpi), Girolamo, a reputable Italian painter, was born at Ferrara in 1501, studied under B. Garofalo. He painted many fine pictures for the churches of Ferrara and Bologna. At the latter place are his two best pictures—one in San Martino Maggiore, of The Adoration of the Magi; and the other in San Salvatore, of The Madonna, with St. Catherine and other saints. He died about 1569. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Carpi, Ugo, an Italian painter and engraver, was born at Rome about 1486, and distinguished himself by the invention of printing in chiaro-scuro, in imitation of drawing. The following are some of his principal engravings: Jacob's Ladder; David with the Head of Goliath; The Murder of the Innocents; The Descent from the Cross, etc. He died about 1530. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carpiānus was the brother to whom Eusebius (iv, 1275) addressed his scheme of canons for a harmony of the Gospels.

Carpilio was a witness of the apostasy of Marcellinus, A.D. 303, and bishop at the Council of Rome, A.D. 324.

Carpini, GIOVANNI DE PLANO, a Franciscan monk, was born in Italy about 1220. Pope Innocent IV sent him, with six others, in 1246, on a religious embassy to the descendants of Genghis Khan, who were threatening Europe. After great hardships he reached his destionation, and, although he but slightly succeeded in his mission, yet he wrote the earliest account that we have of those semi-barbarous nations. It was abridged by Vincent de Beauvais in his Speculum Historicum, and translations may be found in Hakluyt, Purchas, and others. He afterwards labored as a zealous missionary among the central and northern tribes of Europe, and died at an advanced age. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Carpinoni, Domenico, an Italian painter, was born at Clusone in 1566, but visited Venice while young and became a scholar of Palma. In the principal church of Clusone is a picture by him, of The Birth of John the Baptist, also a Descent from the Cross; and a picture of The Transfiguration, in the Valle Cavallina. He died in 1658. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Carpinoni, Marziale, an Italian painter, the grandson and scholar of Domenico, was born at Clusone in 1644. He was instructed in the school of Ciro Ferri, at Rome. He painted a number of historical works for the churches at Clusone, Bergamo, and Brescia. Some of his best works are, The Nativity; The Baptism of Christ; St. Domneo; St. Eusebia. He died in 1722. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Carpion was a Valentinian, who was preaching in the time of Nilus (Epist. 234, p. 167).

Carpioni, Giulio, an Italian painter and engraver, was born at Venice. He was one of the best scholars of Alessandro Varotari, surnamed the Paduan. He settled at Vicenza, where he painted many small pictures representing fantastical or mythological subjects. He also engraved a large number of plates, of which the principal ones are, several Madonnas; Jesus on the Mount of Olives; The Penitent Magdalene; Two Bacchantes; and The Four Elements. He died at Verona in 1611. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carpistes was one of the five alternative appellations employed in the system of Valentinus, to denote the æon Horus. The application of so many different names to the same personage seems to be best explained by the fact that in what is apparently an older form of the Valentinian system, known to us by a fragment in Eusebius (Hæc. xxxi, 6), there correspond to Horus five different æons, Carpistes being the name of one of them. It is intelligible that when the system was simplified by the reduction of the five æons to one, this one should be considered as entitled to receive any of the older appellations. The name is supposed by Grabe to be derived from καρπῖς, the rod with which the prætor emancipated a slave. Καρπιστής then denotes an emancipator, and is completely parallel to λυτρωτής, one of the other titles of Horus. The functions attributed to Horus are stated by Irenæus (i, 3) to be twofold, that of supporting, and of restraining or limiting; as it is by him that each æon is sustained in its own place, and restrained from intruding into that which does not belong to it.

Carpônēs was a presbyter of Alexandria, a rival preacher to Arius, afterwards excommunicated along with him, A.D. 319, and was his companion in exile at Nicomedia, where he signed his letter to Alexander. At a later date he was deputed by Gregory of Cappadocia to pope Julius.

Carpophōrus, Saint (1), was one of the four crowned brothers, martyrs at Rome, in the year 304. The names of the other three were Severus, Severianus, and Victorius, who, with Carpophorus, in the Diocletian persecution, were whipped to death with scourges loaded with lead. Pope Gregory the Great mentions an old church of the four crowned martyrs in Rome, which was subsequently repaired, or rebuilt, by Leo IV and also by Pascal II. This church (Sanctorum Quatuor Coronatorum) is commemorated in an ancient title of a cardinal - priest (see Butler, Nov. 8; Baillet, Nov. 8).

(2) Said to have succeeded Cyprian at Carthage.

(3) The name of a martyr of unknown date, celebrated in Umbria and at Capua and Milan.

(4) Presbyter, martyr at Spoleto, commemorated Dec. 10, in the old Roman Martyrology.

Carpov, Jacob, a German Lutheran theologian, was born at Goslar, Sept. 29, 1699. He studied at Halle and Jena, and at the latter place he completed, in 1725, the course of philosophy and theology. He there professed the system of Canz, which consisted in applying the mathematical and philosophical demonstrations of Wolf to Christian dogmas. This innovation, introduced in the teaching of theology, arrayed against him all the academic corps, and led to the condemnation of his writings. In 1736 he was obliged to leave Jena, and established himself at Weimar, where he continued his course of theology, for many of the students of Jena had followed him. In 1737 he was appointed sub-director of the gymnasium of Weimar; in 1742 professor of mathematics; and in 1745 director of this gymnasium. He was also elected a member of the Academy of Berlin. He died at Weimar, June 9, 1768. Some of his principal works are, Disp. de Rationis Sufficiens Principio (Jena, 1725); — Disp. de Questione, Utrum Tellus sit Machina, an Animal (ibid. eod.): — Disput. Theol. Trinitatis Mysteriorum Methodo Demonstrativa Sistens (ibid. 1730); a writing directed against Polycarp Leyser, who had declared the Trinity contrary to sound judgment. The mathematical proofs given by Carpv in support of the Trinity were commented upon in a work by John Thomas Haupt: Gründe der Vernunft zur Erläuterung und zum Beweise des Geheimnisses der heiligen Dreieinigkeit (Rostock, 1752). The following three works relate to this same controversy: Revelatum S.S. Trinitatis Mysteriorum Methodo Demonstrativa Propositum (Jena, 1735); — De Pluralitate Personarum in Deitate (ibid. eod. and 1737); — Anmerkungen über den Trokat: de Pluralität Person. etc.; — Œconomia Salutis N. T. (Jena, 1737, 1765; Frankfurt and Leipsic, 1737, 1749; and Rudolstadt and Leipsic, 1761); — Disp. de Anima Christi Hominis in se Spectata (Jena, 1737; and a second edition, enlarged, and published under another title—Psychologia Sacratissima, etc., ibid. 1740); — De Statu Humanitatis Christi (ibid. 1741-43); — De Peccato in Sanctum Spiritum Atque Incredulitatis Finitis (Weimar, 1746, 1750); — De Notione et Irremissibilitate Peccati in Spiritum Sanctum (ibid. 1750); — De Ortus Animæ Humanæ et Christi (ibid. 1751). These are only a few of the sixty-eight works enumerated by Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 229 sq. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; also Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 146; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 297, 420. (B. P.)

Carpov, Paul Theodor, a German Orientalist and Lutheran theologian, was born in 1714 at Bolechow, in Polish Prussia. He studied at Rostock, where he took his degrees, and became professor of Hebrew and catechetical theology in 1738. In 1760 he assumed the same position at the newly founded university of Butzow, where he remained until his death, May 27, 1763. He wrote, De Criteriis Nominum et Verborum Lingue Hebrææ (Rostock, 1738); — Cinerum Apud Hebræos Usus (ibid. 1739); — Christus Ecclesie Sponsus (ibid. 1740); — De Jejunii Sabbaticis et Antiquitate Hebrææ (ibid. 1741); — Animadversiones Philologicæ. Sacre (ibid. 1740). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 279; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 146. (B. P.)

Carpus, martyr at Pergamus (Euseb. iv, 16). The Byzantine calendar distinguishes him from the Carpus of Troas, and commemorates him Oct. 13.

April 13 is the day of commemoration in Metaphra-stes and in Ado. The martyrdom is said to have taken place under Decius or Valerian, probably A.D.
251.

Carpzov, Benedikt David, son of Johann
Benedikt, Sr., was a German Lutheran theologian, who lived in the middle of the 17th century. He wrote, Dissertatio de Pontificum Hebræorum Vestitu Sacro (Jena, 1655; found also in Dissertationes Aca-demice, by Johann Benedikt Carpzov, Leipsic, 1699; and in Ugolino, Thesaur. vol. xi). Some of his writings are preserved in manuscript in the library of Raymond Kraft, and some have been inserted in Amenitates Literariæ, by Schelhorn. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Gènerale, s. v.

Carpzov, Johann Benedikt, Jr., a Protestant theologian of Germany, brother of the preceding, was born at Leipsic, April 24, 1639, where he also studied, as well as at Jena and Strasburg. Besides these universities, he also visited others, and when he returned to his native place was appointed, in 1662, preacher at St. Nicholas, in 1665 professor of ethics, in 1668 professor of Hebrew, in 1674 archdeacon, in 1679 pastor of St. Thomas, and in 1684 professor of theology. He died at Leipsic, March 23, 1699. His principal works are, Dissertatio de Nummis Mosen Cornutum Exhibentibus (Leipsic, 1659):—a Latin translation of the treatise of Maimonides, On the Fasts of the Hebrews, with the text (ibid. 1662):—and several treatises upon questions of sacred philology, a collection of which was published (ibid. 1699). He also wrote *Introductio in Theologiam
Judaicam* (ibid. 1687), and edited Schickard's *Jus
Regium Hebræorum* (ibid. 1674); Tarnov's Prophetæ Minores (1688); Lightfoot's Horæ Hebrææ et Tal-mudicæ (1684); Lankisch's *Deutsche, Hebräische u.
Griechische Concordanz* (1696); and his father's Hodegeticum (1689). See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. (2d ed.), s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 142, 239; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Carpzov, Johann Benedikt, third, a German
Orientalist, son of the preceding, and father of Johann Benedikt fourth, was born at Leipsic, Nov. 21, 1670. He studied at Leipsic, Jena, Altdorf, and Strasburg; was made magister at Leipsic in 1696, preacher in 1703, and professor of Hebrew in 1715; and died there, Aug. 14, 1733.
He published a work of his father, Colloquii Rabbinico-biblicum (Leipsic, 1703):—also Christianæ de Urin et Thumim Conjectura:—De Sepultura Josephi Patriarchæ, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carpzov, Samuel Benedikt, a German theologian and scholar, son of Johann Benedikt, Sr., was born at Leipsic, June 17, 1647. He studied at his native place and Wittenberg. Like his brother, Johann Benedikt, Jr., he opposed Spener. In 1674 he was called as third court-preacher to Dresden, was in 1680 superintendent, in 1692 first court-preacher, and died
Aug. 31, 1707. His principal work is Anti-Masenius.
See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carr, Eliash, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Tennessee about 1806.
He experienced religion when ten years old; exercised great influence as a class-leader and exhorter; and in 1831 entered the Tennessee Conference, in which he continued active until his death, at Nashville, Feb.
2, 1866. Mr. Carr was most thoroughly devoted to his calling, and was eminently successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1866,
p. 57.

Carr, George, a clergyman of the Episcopal Church in Scotland, was born at Newcastle, England, Feb. 16, 1704, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. In 1737 he was appointed senior clergyman of the episcopal chapel at Edinburgh, where he spent the remainder of his life. He died Aug. 18, 1776.
Three volumes of his Sermons were published in 1777.

See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Carr, Henry, a Baptist minister, was born at Moorefield, Hardy Co., Va. He graduated at Union College in 1829, and from the Newton Institution in 1832; was ordained at Newton, Sept. 20 of the same year, and went to Ohio, where he was pastor of the Church at Granville, and then of the Church at Akron.
Subsequently he was secretary of the Ohio Education Society, and afterwards acted as an agent to raise funds for Granville College, now Denison University. He died at Granville, July 24, 1864. See *Newton General
Catalogue*, p. 10. (J. C. S.)

Carr, James, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Leeds, Feb. 27, 1810. He was converted at fourteen; entered the ministry in 1832; became a supernumery at Dynas Powis, near Cardiff, Wales, in 1875, and died March 10, 1880. He was eminently successful in turning many to righteousness. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1880, p. 26.

Carr, L. C., a Baptist minister, was born in Pennsylvania in 1814, and early in life removed to Ohio.
He was educated in Granville College, now Denison University. After leaving college he was pastor of the Church in Lockland. Subsequently he removed to Illinois, and preached in Moline, Jerseyville, Griggsville, and other places in that state. Finding his health impaired by the rigors of Northern winters, he removed to Florida, where, at Spring Garden Centre, in that state, he died suddenly, June 3, 1882. He is spoken of as an excellent man, a good preacher, and an earnest worker, making himself especially useful in the cause of temperance in Illinois. See Watch-Tower, June 15, 1882. (J. C. S.)

Carr, Robert, a Scotch clergyman of Tweedmouth, studied theology at the Edinburgh University, was tutor in the family of Sir James Colquhoun; licensed to preach in 1817; ordained in 1821 as minister of the Presbyterian Congregation at Mayport; presented to the living at Luss the same year, and died Sept. 4, 1845. He published An Account of the Parish. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 367.

Carr, Samuel, D.D., an English divine of the latter part of the 18th century, was prebendary of St.
Paul's, and published Sermons on Practical Subjects
(Lond. 1795, 3 vols.). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Carr, Thomas (1), an English Catholic writer, ascetic, and priest, was born in 1599. His real name was Miles Pinckney. After having been procurator of the college at Douay, where he had been studying, he went to Paris, and established there the monastery of the English Augustinians. He died Oct. 31, 1674, leaving, Sweet Thoughts of Jesus and of Mary (1656):
—Pietas Parisiensis (Paris, 1666):—The Love of God, from St. Francis of Sales (ibid. 1630):—The Pledge of Eternity, from Camus, Bishop of Belley (ibid. 1632):— Soliloquies, from Thomas à Kempis (ibid. 1653); and some other works of the same kind. See Hoefer, *Nouv.
Biog. Générale*, s. v.

Carr, Thomas (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Washington County, Pa., Feb. 23, 1793.
He removed, when quite young, with his father to Tuscarawas County, O., was converted in his youth, and, after spending some years as local preacher, was admitted into the Ohio Conference, wherein he continued to travel until 1824, when he joined the Pittsburgh Conference. Subsequently he became a member of the Erie Conference, and in it labored to the close of his life, Sept. 27, 1856. Mr. Carr was a most successful preacher, his mind well disciplined, and his life exemplary. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1857, p.

Carradori, GIACOMO FILIPPO, an old painter of the Bolognese school, was born at Faenza, where he flourished in the latter part of the 16th century, and executed some works for the churches. There are still two altar-pieces by him at Faenza, bearing his name, and dated 1580 and 1582.

Carraill, Matthew, a Scotch clergyman (son of the minister at Edrom), was appointed to the living at Bonkle and Preston in 1607, transferred to Edrom in 1612, and died before Aug. 20, 1646. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticæ, i, 407, 435.

Carraill, William, a Scotch clergyman, was reader at the parish of Edrom from 1574 to 1580, appointed to the living in 1583, and died before July 12, 1612. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticæ, i, 435.

Ildephonsi* (Valencia, 1556, republished by Bollandus, with notes, in the Acta Sanctorum):—Camino del Cielo (ibid. 1601):—Catecismo y Doctrina de Religiosos Novicias, Profesos y Monjas (ibid. 1605). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carrari, Baldassare, an eminent artist of Ravenna, flourished in the first part of the 16th century. He painted for San Domenico at Ravenna the celebrated altar-piece of St. Bartholomew, containing very elegant histories of the holy apostles.

Carraway, George S., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Virginia, was rector in Urbana, Va., in 1853, and remained there for some time. About 1857 he became rector of Old Church, Hanover Co., Va., in which pastorate he remained until his death, at Providence, R. I., Dec. 25, 1867. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1868, p. 104.

Carré, Jean, brother of Remy, also a Benedictine, co-operated in an edition of St. Ambrose (Paris, 1686-90). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carré, Jean Baptiste, a French monk, born in 1593, was the founder of the Noviciate General, at Paris, for the Dominicans, in the Faubourg St. Germain, in which were educated novices from all the provinces.

Carré, Michael, a Dutch painter, was born at Amsterdam in 1666, and studied under his brother, and afterwards under Berghem. One of his principal works is in a saloon at the Hague, where he has represented in large landscapes, with figures, the history of Jacob and Esau. He died in 1728. See Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Carré, Pierre, a French theologian, was born at Rheims in 1749. After teaching rhetoric at Charleville, he became curate of St. Hilaire, a village of Champagne, took the civic oath at the time of the revolution, and afterwards retracted. He died in his native city, Jan. 13, 1823, leaving, La Constitution et la Religion Parfaitement d'Accord:—Réponse des Catholiques à la Lettre de Nicolas Diet. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carré, Remy, a French theologian and musical composer, of the Benedictine order, was born at St. Fal, in the diocese of Troyes, Feb. 20, 1706. He was prior of Beceleuf and sacristan of the convent of la Celle, and died at the close of the 18th century, leaving, Le Maître des Novices dans l'Art de Chanter (Paris, 1744); which contains a high-sounding eulogy on wine, which he recommended for the cure of all ills:—also La Clef des Psaumes (ibid. 1755):—Plan de la Bible Latine Distribuée en Forme de Bréviaire (Cologne [Paris], 1780).

Carré, Thomas, an English priest, published, in the year 1652, at Paris, a treatise to prove that the De Imitatione Christi was written by Thomas à Kempis.

Carrel, Louis Joseph, a French theologian, a native of Seyssel in Bugey, who lived at the close of the 17th century, wrote La Pratique des Billets (Louvain, 1690; Brussels, 1698):—La Science Ecclésiastique Suffisante à Elle-même (Lyons, 1700):—Avis à l'Auteur de la Vie de M. d'Aranthon d'Alex (Brussels and Lyons, eod.):—Avis et Trois Lettres, upon the propositions concerning the revelation and authenticity of the sacred text, published in the Histoire des Ouvrages des Savants of 1708. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Y., from 1854 to 1862; and chaplain in the United States Army until 1864. He was in infirm health at Easton, Pa., after 1865, and died there, June 21, 1877. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 103.

Carren(n)o (de Miranda), Don Juan, an eminent Spanish painter, was born at Aviles, in the Asturias, in 1614, and studied at Madrid under Las Cuevas, and afterwards under Bartolomé Romano. At Madrid he painted the celebrated cupola of Sant Pedro de l'Antonio, and a fine picture of Magdalene in the Desert, in the Convent de las Recogidas. He died in 1685. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carrera, FRANCESCO, an Italian Jesuit, was born in Sicily in 1629, and died Feb. 27, 1679, leaving Pantheon Siculum, sive Sanctorum Siculorum Elogia (Genoa, 1679, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carretus, LUDOVICUS, a Jewish convert (originally Tadros Cohen), was a native of France. As the physician of a Spanish duke, he was with the imperial troops who besieged Florence in 1530. Some years afterwards, at the age of fifty, he professed Christianity, at Genoa. He wrote מִרְיָאוֹת אֱלֹהִים, Liber Visorum Divinorum, a cabalistic work, in which he speaks of his conversion, quoting at the same time passages from the Bible and the Cabala for the truth of Christianity. It was translated into Latin by Angelo Canini (Paris, 1553). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 146; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. i, 724; Delitzsch, Saat auf Hoffnung, vii (1870), 375; id. Wissenschaft, Kunst, Judenthum (Grimma, 1838), p. 290. (B. P.)

Carrick, James, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1765, presented to the living at Baldernock by the king, in 1772, and ordained; transferred to New Kirkpatrick in 1776, and died Feb. 28, 1787. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 343, 365.

Carrick, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, studied at the Glasgow University, and was licensed to preach in 1713; became tutor in the family of Andrew Buchanan, provost of Glasgow, through whom he was called, in 1719, to the living at Houston, and ordained in 1720. He died May 1, 1771, aged ninety years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 215.

Carrick, Samuel, a Presbyterian minister, was born in York County, Pa., July 17, 1760. At an early age he went to the valley of Virginia, and there pursued his studies under the Rev. William Graham. He was licensed by the Hanover Presbytery, Oct. 25, 1781; became pastor at Rocky Spring, in November, 1783, and for several years after 1786 divided his labors between New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Tennessee. He was active in civil and ecclesiastical affairs. He died in 1806. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 433.

Carrière (or Carrières), François de, a French monk of the order of Conventuals of St. Francis, was born at Apt in 1612, and died in 1655, leaving, Medulla Bibliorum, Exprimens Summarie qualibet Testamenti Liber Veteris Continet (Lyons, fol. 1660):—Fidei Cathol. Digestum, etc. (ibid. 1657, 2 vols. fol.). See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Carrière, Joseph, a French theologian, was born at Avignon, Feb. 19, 1795. He was educated at the seminary of St. Sulpice, and became professor of theology in the same institution, and afterwards director. He was finally appointed superior, in place of M. de Courson, who died just at the time when M. Carrière published a work on theology which was highly esteemed by the clergy, entitled Praelectiones Theologiae. He also wrote De Matrimonio (Paris):—De Justitia et Jure (ibid. 1839):—De Contractibus (ibid. 1844-47). M. Carrière always dealt impartially with questions of controversy concerning the Church. He died April 23, 1864. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carrillo, Francisco Perez, a Spanish ascetic theologian, who lived in the early half of the 17th century, wrote Via Sacra, Exercicios Espirituales, y Arte de bien Morir (Saragossa, 1619). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carrillo, Juan, a Spanish Franciscan, brother of Martin, left an account of the Third Order of St. Francis, published in two parts (1610 and 1613); also a Life of St. Isabel, queen of Portugal, and an account of the foundation of the monastery of Disalceates of Santa Clara, at Madrid (Madrid, 1616).

Carrillo, Martin, a celebrated Spanish historian and juriconsult, was born in the latter part of the 16th century at Saragossa, where for ten years he professed the canon law, and where he subsequently obtained a canonry in the cathedral. In 1611 Philip III sent him to Sardinia, whence he returned in the following year; and he died abbot of Mount Aragon, about 1630. He wrote, Annales Memoriarum Cronologicas, etc. (Huesca, 1622, fol.):—Historia del Glorioso St. Valero Obispo de Zaragoza (Saragossa, 1615, 4to), containing lists of all the prelates, bishops, etc., of the kingdom of Aragon:—Relacion del Regno de Sardenia (Barc. 1612):—Catalogus Archiep. Casaravagustane Eccl. (Cagliari, 1611, etc.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Carroll, Andrew, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in County Monaghan, Ireland, Dec. 24, 1810. He was educated at Belfast; emigrated to Canada in his youth; was converted in 1830; and removed to Ohio, where he was employed as school-teacher, and where he joined the Church. In 1833 he was licensed to exhort, in 1834 to preach, and in 1835 entered the Ohio Conference. He continued his faithful, zealous labors without abatement until his death, Feb. 17, 1870. Mr. Carroll was humble, brotherly, and able. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 266.

Carroll, Henry G., a Baptist minister, was born in Dublin, Ireland, in December, 1822. He was educated as a Presbyterian, and for a time was pastor of a church of that denomination in his native city. In 1867 he came to Canada, and the year succeeding to the United States. He united with the Baptist Church, and became a minister of that denomination in Pontiac, Ill.; Orangeville, Mich.; Denison, Ia.; Appleton, Wis.; Evanston and Chicago, Ill. He died at Deadwood, Dak., in November, 1883, to which place he had gone for his health. See Chicago Standard, Dec. 6, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Carroll, John, an Irish Congregational minister, was born at Ballynick, Armagh, in 1791. He grew up a Christian; early thirsted to preach the Gospel; received his special ministerial preparation at Dublin Theological Institution, and began his ministerial office at Ballycraig, Antrim, in 1817. Here he labored with noble self-sacrifice and consuming zeal till 1827, when he accepted a call to Richhill, Armagh, where he remained twenty-one years, becoming exceedingly popular as a preacher, and greatly respected as a pastor. In 1848 Mr. Carroll resigned the pastorate, removed to Newry, labored for several years as evangelist, and then returned to his native place, where he died, May 14, 1867. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1868, p. 261.

Carroll, Philip Clifton, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Mercer County, Pa., Oct. 14, 1840. He was converted in 1868, and admitted into the Illinois Conference the same year. He served the Church faithfully until his death, April 24, 1879. Mr. Carroll had studied law before his conversion, thereby gaining much logical power. As a speaker, he was clear, brilliant, elegant, and sympathetic. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 42.

Carron, Guy Toussaint Julien, Abbé, a French philanthropist, was born at Rennes, Feb. 23, 1760. He was tonsured at the age of thirteen, and taught the children of the suffering classes, and relieved their wants. In 1785, having been impressed by the disorder arising from beggary throughout his province, he conceived the idea of erecting an institution of charity, for which he interested a number of noble families, who contributed large sums to the execution of his plan; so that the city of Rennes, in 1791, came into possession of cotton spinning-mills, weaving establishments, etc., which occupied more than two thousand working people of both sexes, under his direction. In 1792, having been banished to the island of Jersey, together with many others during the French Revolution, he established there two schools for the instruction of young French refugees, a new chapel for Catholic worship, and a library for divines. In 1796 he went to London, where he received contributions which greatly extended his works of charity. At Somerstown, a suburb of London, a building was erected, for the instruction of French youth. He returned to Paris in 1814, and died there, March 15, 1821. The active charity and constant occupation of abbé Carron did not prevent his devoting himself to his ministry, nor from writing religious books for the instruction or edification of the faithful. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carron, Philippe Marie Thérèse Guy, a French prelate, nephew of Guy Toussaint Julien, was born at Rennes, Dec. 13, 1788. Having been vicar, then rector, of St. Germain, at Rennes, he became grand-vicar to the bishop of Nevers, and was appointed in 1829 bishop of Mans, where he instituted nuns of the Carmelite and Bon Pasteur orders. He died Aug. 27, 1833. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carrouth, James L., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Madison, Fla., Jan. 27, 1842. He experienced religion in 1857, and in 1859 was licensed to preach, and received into the Florida Conference. In the latter part of 1861 he enlisted in the Confederate army, and died Jan. 9, 1862. He was a young man of extraordinary talents and great promise. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1862, p. 410.

Carruoci (da Pontorno), JACOPO. See PONTORMO.

Carruthers, David, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1816; presented to the living at Kirkden by the king, in 1824, and was ordained. He had a new church built in 1825, and died Nov. 21, 1846, aged sixty-one years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 803.

Carruthers, James, a Scotch clergyman, the earliest Protestant minister in the parish of Buittle, was first an exhorter at Preston in 1570, and was appointed to the living at Buittle in 1574. He continued in 1586, and was transferred in 1588 to Crossmichael, with two other parishes in charge; he continued in 1590, and removed to Balmaghie the same year, and continued in 1593. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 697, 703, 708.

Carrying-cloth is a robe or cloth in which children were anciently enveloped when taken to church for baptism. It was made of various materials—satin, silk, or lawn, richly and appropriately embroidered.

Cars, LAURENT, an eminent French designer and engraver, was born at Lyons in May, 1699. When young he went to Paris, and soon acquired distinction. Cars may be considered one of the best artists of his time, in the class of subjects he has represented. He died at Paris, April 14, 1771. The following are some of his principal works: The Adoration of the Shepherds; The Flight into Egypt; The Chastity of Joseph; Adam and Eve before their Sin; Adam and Eve after their Sin. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carsan, JOHN, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1670, and had a charge at Longford, Ireland; was presented to the living at Abdie in 1691; and died May 18, 1719, aged about sixty-nine years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 468.

Carsane, ROBERT, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1624; was admitted to the living at Newton in 1640; ordained in 1641; and was a member of the Commission of Assembly in 1645. He continued Dec. 12, 1661, and conformed to Episcopacy. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 298.

Carshun Version of the Scriptures. The Carshun, or Arabic in Syriac characters, is used (chiefly by members of the Syrian churches) in Mesopotamia, Aleppo, and in many parts of Syria. A diglot edition of the New Test., in which the Syriac Peshito and the Carshun from the Arabic text of Erpenius were ranged in parallel columns, was published in 1703 at Rome, for the use of the Maronite Christians. From this edition the British and Foreign Bible Society had a new edition prepared at Paris in 1827; M. de Quatremère and Baron de Lacy were the editors. See Bible of Every Land, p. 56. (B. P.)

Carslake, WILLIAM, an English Presbyterian minister, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and had the living of Werrington, Devonshire, till ejected in 1662, when he came to London and preached there during the Great Plague, 1665-66. He then settled at Parish Street, Horsleydown, till his death, in 1689. Calamy said "he was a good and pious man, but inclined to melancholy." See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 275.

Carson, David, an Associate minister, was born in Greencastle, Pa., Oct. 25, 1799. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1819, and took a theological course in New York. After receiving several calls from different congregations, he finally accepted one from the congregations at Big Spring, Pistol Creek, and Monroe, in Tennessee. He was ordained in 1824; labored in Tennessee ten years, and was then elected professor of Hebrew, Biblical antiquities, chronology, and Church history in the Associate Presbyterian Seminary at Cannonsburg, Pa. He did not live to enter upon his duties as professor, but died Sept. 25, 1834. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 117.

Carson, Irwin, a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1809. He was at one time pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Chillicothe, O., and afterwards of the Church of Oskaloosa, Ia. He returned to Ohio and supplied a number of churches. He died at Chillicothe, May 31, 1875. See Presbyterian, June 26, 1875. (W. P. S.)

Carson, Joseph, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Winchester, Va., Feb. 19, 1785. He was converted in his fifteenth year; soon became class-leader, exhorter, and local preacher; and in 1805 entered the Baltimore Conference, and was appointed as junior preacher on Wyoming Circuit. There was not a church on the circuit—the preaching was in private houses, barns, and groves; nevertheless, six hundred were led to Christ that year, and a new circuit formed. Thus he labored on large circuits, and met with great success, until 1812, when impaired health led him to locate. In 1824 he entered the Virginia Conference, and in it remained faithful to the close of his life, April 15, 1875. Mr. Carson possessed a clear, logical, powerful mind; a strong, pure, self-sacrificing character; a genial, confiding spirit, and deep piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 143; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Carson, Leander, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born April 12, 1823. He was converted about 1841; licensed to exhort in 1852; and in 1854 received license to preach, and was admitted into the North-western Indiana Conference, in which he served the Church with zeal and fidelity till his death, March 24, 1858. Mr. Carson was deeply imbued with the spirit of the Christian ministry, and was faithful and successful in his work. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1858, p. 282.

Carson, Robert (1), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1745; presented to the living at Anwoth in 1753; and died March 26, 1769. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 694.

Carson, Robert (2), an Irish Methodist preacher, was born at Omagh, County Tyrone, in 1784. He was converted in his youth, and became an itinerant preacher in Ireland in 1808, laboring with earnestness and success for thirteen years; he then became a supernumerary, and died May 29, 1854. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1854.

Carson, Robert Joiner, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born near Louisburg, Franklin Co., N. C., in 1809. He was led to Christ in early life; obtained a good English education, and in 1829 entered the Virginia Conference. On the formation of the North Carolina Conference, in 1837, he became one of its members, and in it for four consecutive years labored with all his energy. In 1858 he returned to the Virginia Conference as a superannuate, which relation he sustained to the close of his life, in 1873. Mr. Carson was a fine preacher, often powerful, always simple; a charming companion, and a steadfast friend. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1873, p. 787.

Carstairs, David, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Fife, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1664; was licensed to preach in 1670; instituted to the living at Kirkmaiden in 1677; resigned before August, 1681, and died in Edinburgh, Oct. 11, 1692, aged about forty-nine years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 761.

Carstairs, George Andrew, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was educated at the grammar-school, Kingsbarns, and at the University of St. Andrews; became tutor in the family of Mr. Lundin; was licensed to preach in 1802; presented to the living at Anstruther-Wester in 1804; ordained in 1805, and died at Devon-Grove, Dollar, Oct. 11, 1838, aged fifty-eight years. He published, The Scottish Communion Service (Edinb. 1829):—and a Sermon in the Scottish Pulpit. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 409.

Carstairs, James, A.M., a Scotch clergyman born at Boarhills, took his degree at the University of St. Leonards in 1662; was licensed to preach in 1666; appointed to the living at Tannadice in 1667, and ordained; was transferred to Inchture in 1682, and died before May 4, 1709, aged about fifty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 705, 782.

Carstairs, John, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1641; was licensed to preach in 1646; presented to the living at Cathcart in 1647, and ordained. He was elected in 1648 for the living at Burnt-Island, and for one of the livings at Edinburgh in 1649, but was transferred to the Outer High Church in Glasgow in 1650. He accompanied the army, was wounded, stripped naked, and left among the dead at the battle of Dunbar the same year. He had charge of the south district of the city in 1651, and removed to the Inner High Church in 1655. When it was proposed to unite the Resolutioners and Protestors, he urged agreement unconditionally. He had the west quarter of the city for his charge in 1659, and the east district from 1660 to 1662. He was deprived and imprisoned in 1663 for not taking the oath of allegiance; was charged in 1664 with "keeping conventicles," and fled to Ireland, but returned; joined the rising in 1666, for which he was indicted, but had indemnity in 1667, and fled to Holland, where he refused to become minister of the Scottish Church, but returned soon after; attended lord chancellor Rothes on his death-bed, in 1681, and the earl of Argyll previous to his execution, in 1685. He died Feb. 5, 1686, aged sixty-three years. He published some Poems and Letters:—A Treatise on Scandal:—Unsearchable Riches of Christ:—Calderwood's True History of the Church of Scotland (1678). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 8, 22, 59.

Carstens, Aasmus Jakob, a Danish painter, was born at Sankt-Jürgen, near Schleswig, May 10, 1754. While young he served in a mercantile house; but afterwards, quitting his master, went to Copenhagen, where he supported himself for seven years by taking portraits in red chalk. During these years he produced two of his best pictures: The Death of Æschylus, and Eolus and Ulysses. In 1783 he started for Rome, but could go no farther than Mantua, on account of his poverty. Here he remained a month, and then went to Lubeck, where he spent five years in obscurity. Through the poet Overbeck he became acquainted with one of his wealthy patrons, who sent him to Berlin, where his Fall of the Angels gained him a professorship in the Academy of Fine Arts. In 1792 he went to Rome and studied the works of Raphael and Michael Angelo, and also those of Albert Dürer, at Dresden. His best works were designs in water-colors and paintings in fresco. He died at Rome, May 25, 1798. His biography was published in 1806 (new ed. by Riegel, 1867), and his works engraved by Müller in 1869. See Rose, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Carstens, Heinrich Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 9, 1715, at Witzendorf. He studied at Helmstädt, was in 1746 pastor at Hanover, in 1754 pastor primarius at Hitzacker, and in 1759 superintendent at Burgdorf, where he died, April 30, 1763. He wrote, Commentatio ad Joa. III, 38 (Lemgow, 1744):—Disquisitio Theologica de χρηστότητι Christiana (Göttingen, 1760). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Carswell, Donald, A.B., a Scotch clergyman (brother of bishop Carswell), studied at the University of St. Andrews in 1554, and took his degree there in 1558; was appointed first Protestant minister at Inishail in 1572, and soon afterwards the parish was united to Clachan-Dysart. He resigned the rectory the same year, and was vicar, in 1581, of Kilmartin. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 11, 68.

Carswell, John, a Scotch clergyman, studied at the University of St. Andrews in 1548. He had been a conventual brother in the abbey of Icolmkill; was rector at Kilmartin from 1553 to 1564; embraced the Protestant faith, and was appointed chaplain to the earl of Argyll; was nominated by Parliament as superintendent of Argyll, in 1560; and was promoted to the bishopric of the isles in 1566, by queen Mary. In the General Assembly of 1569 he was reproved for accepting without informing the assembly, and "for assisting at the parliament held by the queen after the murder of Darnley the king." He died between July 10 and Sept. 20, 1572, and was a man of great piety and learning, as well as of wealth and official power. He published a translation of John Knox's Liturgy, the first book printed in Gaelic, only two copies of which are known to exist. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 11, 447; Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 307.

Cart, Josiah, was, at the British Wesleyan Methodist Conference of 1867, received as a candidate for the foreign missions; soon after he was appointed to Balize, but died in Jamaica, before reaching his destination, May 8, 1868. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1868, p. 42.

Cartaphilus (or Cartophyllus), in Christian legend, was a Roman soldier who was doorkeeper at the entrance to the palace of Pilate at the time of our Lord's crucifixion. When Jesus was led out thence, and went too slow for Cartaphilus, the latter struck him with his hand, and mockingly said, "Faster, Jesus, faster;

why tarriest thou?" But Jesus pitifully looked at him, and said, "I go, but thou shalt tarry until I come again!" In fulfilment of the Saviour's prophecy, Cartophilus still waits in tears and anxiety for the judgment, and only the Saviour's own merciful prayer sustains him: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." This is the basis of the fable about the Wandering Jew (q. v.). See Meth. Quar. Rev. July, 1882.

Carte, John, an English clergyman, was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge (1707). Having taken holy orders, he became first vicar of Tachbroke, in Warwickshire, and was afterwards promoted to the vicarage of Hinckley, in Leicestershire, with the rectory of Stoke annexed. At this place he resided from 1720 until his death, Dec. 17, 1735.

Carte, Samuel, an English divine and antiquary, was born in 1653, and educated at Coventry, his native place, whence he removed to Oxford. He became prebendary of Lichfield, and vicar of St. Martin's, at Leicester, where he died, in 1740, leaving Tabula Chronologica Archiepisc. et Episcopatum in Anglia et Wallia, Ortus, Divisiones, Translationes, etc., Breviter Exhibens (fol. without date).

Carte, Thomas, an English clergyman and learned historian, was born at Clifton, in Warwickshire, in 1686, and educated at University College, Oxford. In 1712 he made the tour of Europe, and on his return entered into holy orders, and was appointed reader of the Abbey Church at Bath. There he preached a sermon, Jan. 30, 1714, in vindication of Charles I, against aspersions cast upon his memory with regard to the Irish rebellion. This led to a controversy, which was but the beginning of a stormy career. He officiated for some time as curate of Coleshill, Warwickshire, and was afterwards secretary to bishop Atterbury. In 1722 he was charged with treason, and compelled to escape to France. From that time forward his life was devoted to letters. He returned to England between 1728 and 1730, and died at Caldecot House, near Abingdon, Berkshire, April 2, 1754. His principal works are, The Irish Massacre Set in Clear Light, etc.—History of the Life of James, Duke of Ormonde, etc. (1735, 1736):—and four volumes of the History of England. This was the great repository of facts from which Hume drew so largely, and with so little credit to the real author. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Carter, Albert, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was received into the New Hampshire Conference in 1842, from which time till within a few days of his death, Aug. 1, 1852, he labored with diligence and success. He everywhere gave evidence of a sterling Christian character and thorough devotion to Methodism. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1853, p. 223.

Carter, Benjamin, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in the Ohio or the Mississippi valley. He was converted about 1785, and two years later entered the itinerancy. He died at Shoulderbone, Washington Co., Ga., in August, 1792. Mr. Carter was a man of perennial happiness and great courage, a pointed, zealous preacher, and a strict disciplinarian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1793, p. 49.

Carter, Edward, a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about 1790. He was licensed, in 1816, by the First Church in Montville, Me., and ordained pastor of the Second Brooksville Church in 1817. Here he remained for seven years, and for several years was an itinerant preacher. In 1832 he became pastor of the Church in Plymouth, Me., where he continued to labor, amid many discouragements, from 1832 to 1843. On resigning he engaged in evangelistic work. The date of his death is not recorded. See Mellett, Hist. of the Baptists of Maine, p. 438. (J. C. S.)

Carter, E. J. G., a Baptist minister, was born in Mississippi in 1846, and removed to Arkansas in 1852. About 1870 he began to preach, and after supplying different churches for five years, he was ordained in 1876. The field of his ministerial labors was with churches in Washita and Nevada counties, Ark. He died in 1879. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 188. (J. C. S.)

Carter, Herbert, a native Wesleyan Methodist missionary, was converted early; embraced Methodism at the cost of much sacrifice; was called to the ministry in 1843; was one of the first of the native ministers of the Wesleyan body ordained in Jamaica, W. I., and died at Ocho-Rios, Jamaica, Sept. 29, 1861. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1862, p. 37.

Carter, Hugh, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Mold, Flintshire, June 15, 1784. He was converted at Denbigh, whither his parents had removed a few years after his birth. In 1805 he began to preach in Welsh, but was afterwards connected with the English work. In 1855 he was made a supernumerary, and died Sept. 8 of that year. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1866.

Carter, James, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born in Tentore, Queen's County. He entered the ministry in 1797; retired from the active work in 1837; resumed it, and again retired on account of an accident in 1841, and died July 31, 1844. He was "a true witness for his Lord." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1845.

Carter, James W., a Baptist minister, was born in Wilson County, Tenn., Feb. 6, 1817. He united with the Church in April, 1841; soon after was licensed, and was ordained Sept. 21, 1845. After preaching for a year or two, he was called, in 1848, to be pastor of Shady Grove Church, Haywood Co.; also had pastoral care of another church for seven years. From 1849 to 1854 he preached for a church in Quincy. In 1854 five churches looked to him as their pastor. An attack of hemorrhage of the lungs compelled him to give up preaching in 1857, and he died near Chestnut Bluffs, March 15, 1858. See Borum, Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, i, 137-139. (J. C. S.)

Carter, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Blandford, in 1788. He early united with the Church, entered Hoxton College in 1808, and was ordained over the Independent Church at Braintree in 1812, where he remained till his death, June 23, 1864. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1865, p. 230.

Carter, John J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Patonsburg, Botetourt Co., Va., Sept. 16, 1806. He experienced religion in 1824, and in 1830 entered the Virginia Conference, wherein he labored until his death, Nov. 3, 1838. Mr. Carter was a zealous, successful preacher, much beloved, an amiable, pious man, and a deeply devoted Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1834, p. 278.

Carter, Joseph Sykes, an English Congregational minister, was born at Booth Banks, near Huddersfield, May 16, 1830. He was piously educated, and, after many struggles with scepticism, became converted, studied at Airedale College, and entered upon his pastoral duties at West Houghton, Yorkshire, with great energy and diligence. Here he died, Feb. 5, 1860. Mr. Carter, during his last years, was filled with a holy enthusiasm, and a glowing anxiety for the salvation of souls. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1861, p. 205.

Carter, Lawson, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Ohio, was rector of Grace Church, Cleveland, in which position he remained until 1861, when he retired from the active ministry, retaining his residence in Cleveland. He died July 11, 1868. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1869, p. 109.

Carter, Oscar, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a slave in Tennessee till the emancipation proclamation by president Lincoln. He served two or more years in the Union army, and afterwards took up his residence at Vicksburg, Miss., where he joined the Church, and received license to exhort and to preach. In 1872 he was ordained deacon in the Mississippi Conference, and in the following year was sent to Forest Station, where he remained until his death by assassination, in November, 1875, being about thirty-five years of age. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 13; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Carter, Samuel Henry, an English Congregational minister, was born at Midsomer Norton, Somersetshire, in 1812, and early trained in the principles of the Established Church. At the age of sixteen he united with the Wesleys of his native village, and began active Christian work. In 1837 he went to London, where he devoted such time as he could spare from his business to the duties devolving on a local preacher. He was early employed by the London City Missionary Society, and labored in the neighborhood of King's Cross for twenty years. During this period he joined the Congregational Church at Offord Road, Barnsbury. He accepted a call to the pastorate of the Congregational Church at Pembury, Tunbridge Wells, and entered upon his labors there in November, 1860. In 1870 he accepted the pastorate of the Church at Jarvis Brook, Rotherfield, where he remained until his death, Oct. 3, 1880. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 361.

Carter, Thomas (1), an English Congregational minister, was born at Olney, Buckinghamshire, Dec. 11, 1788. In 1806 he joined the Church, and afterwards gave up his business and commenced teaching at Sherington, near his native place. For some years he preached occasionally, at the same time studying under Rev. J. Morris, of Olney, and afterwards under Rev. J. P. Bull at Newport Pagnel. In 1827 he was invited to Great Horwood, where he remained over three years. He then removed to Churchover, Warwickshire, and thence, after sixteen years' pastorate, to Tollesbury, Essex. He left Essex in 1849, and returned to Churchover, where he remained till his death, Oct. 12, 1856. He was an instructive, useful, and evangelical preacher. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1857, p. 169.

Carter, Thomas (2), an English Congregational minister, was born in London, Sept. 13, 1840. When about eighteen years of age he was converted, and soon afterwards began to preach. In 1860 he was accepted for service by the London Missionary Society, and sent to study at Bedford. He was ordained Aug. 26, 1863, and sailed with his wife Sept. 17 for Lonsdale, Berbice, in British Guiana. Failing health caused his return in one year; and, after a brief rest, he accepted the pastorate of the church at Great Totham, Essex, where he labored successfully for three and a half years. His next charge was at Albion, Hammersmith; and his last at Newnham, Gloucester. Each of these in turn was given up because of failing health, and he finally retired from the ministry. He died April 1, 1881. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 287.

Carter, William, a Congregational minister, was born at New Canaan, Conn., Dec. 31, 1803. In 1824 he entered Yale College, and was converted during his course of study there. Immediately after his graduation, in 1828, he became a teacher in the Hartford Grammar-school, and later a tutor in Yale College. In 1830 he entered the Yale Theological School. In 1833 he resigned his tutorship to enter the missionary work, and, upon his arrival in Illinois, assisted in organizing a church at Jacksonville, of which he soon after became pastor. In the fall of 1838 he resigned this charge and went to Pittsfield, Ill., where he spent the remainder of his days, but resigned his pastoral charge three years before his death, which occurred Feb. 9, 1871. See Cong. Quarterly, 1871, p. 497.

Carter, William H., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Sumter District, S. C., Oct. 31, 1830. He was converted in 1850; began preaching in 1853, and in the same year entered the Alabama Conference. He died July 19, 1869. As a preacher Mr. Carter was gifted and eloquent. The most marked feature of the man was his spirit of consecration to God. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1869, p. 335.

Carteria, THE MARTYRS OF, in Africa, are commemorated Feb. 2 in the Carthaginian calendar. They may therefore be either Victor, Marinus, Honoratus, Hilary, Urban, and Perpetua; or else Fortunatus, Felician, Firmus, Candidus, Castula, and Secundula: both which sets are marked that day in the Hieronymian Martyrology of D'Achery.

Carterius is the name of several men in early Christian records. See also PAMPHILUS; PHILOSTORGUS.

1. A martyr at Sebaste, in Lesser Armenia, under Licinius and duke Marcellus. If the title be rightly attached to the legend, he was of the company of Atticus, Eudoxius, and Agapius, who had taken counsel with the whole army to abide in the faith of Christ. They were tortured and imprisoned, then brought out and beaten, and finally burned, with many others, Nov. 2.

2. Signed the epistle of the Council of Alexandria to Antioch in A.D. 362 (Tillem. viii, 212). He only says, "I, Carterius, pray your welfare." Tillemont supposes him to be the bishop whose exile was mourned by the Church of Antaratud, as Athanasius (i, 703) tells in his apology for his flight.

3. The joint provost with Diodorus, afterwards bishop of Tarsus, of a monastery in or near Antioch, under whom Chrysostom and his companions studied the holy Scriptures and practiced asceticism (Socrates, H. E. vi, 8). He may also be the same that is commemorated by Gregory Nazianzen. Again, there is a Carterius on whom Gregory wrote an epitaph. Chrysostom was with Carterius up to A.D. 380. Tillemont (ix, 370) says that there was an abbey of St. Carterius near Emera, in Phœnicia, in the middle of the 6th century.

4. Governor of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, A.D. 404. Chrysostom having halted at Cæsarea on his way to his place of exile at Cucusus, was there attacked by a mob of fanatic monks, the tools of the bishop Pharetrius, his concealed enemy, from whose violence Carterius used his utmost efforts to shield him. His endeavors proving ineffectual, he made a vain appeal to Pharetrius to call off the monks and allow Chrysostom to enjoy the rest his enfeebled health required. On his arrival at Cucusus, Chrysostom sent him a warm letter of thanks for his services, and begged that he might hear from him (Epist. 14, p. 236).

5. A presbyter of Constantinople, who brought Anatolius's letter to Leo the Great, and carried back the answer (Leo, Epist. 80, p. 1039), April, A.D. 451.

Carthach (Lat. Carthagi) is the name of two early Christian saints.

1. The Elder, commemorated March 5, is entered in the Mart. Tullaght as "Carthach mac-Aengusa Droma Ferdaím," and in Mart. Doneg. as bishop, alumnus of Ciaran of Saighir. Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, p. 473-476) gives a memoir from what little is known of him. He was of royal descent in Munster, being son or grandson of Aengus, king of Cashel. He was sent by St. Ciaran upon a penitential pilgrimage, when he spent seven years abroad, visiting Gaul and Rome. On his return he taught, and founded churches and monasteries, St. Ciaran choosing him, it is said, to be his successor. The scene of his labors was Kerry, where he was bishop; he had a church called Druim-Fertain, in Carberry; another on Inis-Uachtair, in Loch Sileann, now Sheelinn; and a third, Cill-Carthach, in Tir-Boghaine, in Tircornel, County Donegal. In Kerry, on the banks of the Mang, he trained his pupil and namesake, St. Carthage the younger. The year of neither his birth nor his death is known, but he flourished about A.D. 540, and probably did not die before 580. His two chief designations are "alumnus S. Kieran Sagirensis," and "institutor S. Carthacii Junioris seu Mochuda" (see Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. Ir. ii, 98 sq.; Kelly, Cal. Ir. Sanctorum, p. 83). The Bollandists (Acta Sanctorum, Mart. i, 389-399) have a combined account of St. Kieran and St. Carthach.

2. The Younger, commemorated May 14, is one of the most noted saints in the beginning of the 7th century. Two lives are given by the Bollandists (Acta Sanctorum, May 14, tom. iii), the second life being the most historical. There is also a Life of St. Carthage in the so-called Book of Kilkenney, in Primate Marsh's Library, Dublin. He was a native of Kerry, and for forty years ruled his community of monks in Rahen of Ballycowan, King's County, where scholars flocked to him from all parts of Ireland and Britain, so that he is said to have had eight hundred and sixty-seven under him. He had been ordained priest by the elder St. Carthach, perhaps about 580, and at Rahen, which was probably founded in 591, and was consecrated bishop. For his monks he drew up a rule, but, notwithstanding his sanctity and zeal, he was driven from Rahen by Blathmac, king of the country. His expulsion from Rahen "in diebus paschæ" is usually set down at 630; the Four Masters give 631, and the other Irish annals place it later. After wandering about for some time he was at last presented with land for a monastery, by Metris, which was the origin of the present church and town of Lismore. St. Carthach had only been a short time at Lismore when he died, May 14, 637, and was buried in the monastery.

CARTHAGE, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Carthagenense). An account of some of these have been given in the arts. AFRICAN COUNCILS; CARTHAGE, COUNCILS OF; and MILEVIS. The following are additional particulars:

I. Was held in 217, by Agrippinus, bishop of Carthage, and attended by all the bishops of Africa and Numidia. In this council it was declared that those who have received the form of baptism out of the Church may not be admitted into it without being rebaptized. See Labbe and Cossart, Concil. i, 607.

II. Held by St. Cyprian, at the head of sixty-six bishops, about 253 (?). Here a letter was read from Fidus, which informed them that another bishop, named Therapies, had granted reconciliation to Victor, who had been ordained priest a long time before, without his having undergone a full and entire course of penance, and that, too, when the people had not required it, nor even known anything about it; and there was no plea of necessity, such as illness, to constrain him. The council expressed great indignation at the act, and administered a strong rebuke to Therapies; nevertheless, they would not deprive of communion Victor, who had been admitted to it by his own bishop. See Labbe, Concil. i, 741.

III. Held in 254, by St. Cyprian, at the head of thirty-six bishops. It was decided that Basilides, bishop of Leon, and Martial, bishop of Astorga, could not be any longer recognised as bishops, being both of them among the "Libellatici," and also guilty of various crimes. See Labbe, Concil. i, 746.

IV. Was also held in 254 upon the case of those who had relapsed into idolatry during the persecutions. See LAPSI. The circumstances of this council are detailed under NOVATUS.

First, to remove the doubts of those who had been influenced by the false statements of Novatian and his party, with respect to the conduct and consecration of Cornelius, the council resolved to obtain the testimonial of those who were present at his consecration, and to send deputies to Rome to inquire into the matter. This precautionary step did not, however, hinder St. Cyprian from recognising at once the election of Cornelius.

When the deputies of Novatian arrived at Carthage, they required that the bishops should examine their accusations against Cornelius; to which the fathers in council answered, that they would not suffer the reputation of their brother to be attacked, after he had been elected by so many votes, and consecrated; and that a bishop having been once recognised by his fellow-bishops, it was a sin to consecrate another to the same see; and further, the council addressed a synodal letter to Cornelius upon the subject.

Then they proceeded to inquire into the case of Felicissimus, and the five priests who had followed him: these men they condemned and excommunicated. And further, seeing that the two sects, viz., that of Felicissimus and Novatus on the one hand, and of Novatian on the other, virtually destroyed penance by the opposite extremes to which they endeavored to bring it—the former abolishing it, in fact, by admitting at once to communion all those who had fallen into sin, while the others altogether refused to acknowledge its efficacy—they proceeded to consider the case of the relapsed. It was decreed that the Libellatici, who, immediately after the commission of their fault, began a course of penance, should be thenceforward admitted to communion: that those who had actually sacrificed should be treated more severely, yet so as not to take from them the hope of forgiveness; that they should be for a long period kept to a course of penance, in order that they might thus seek with tears and repentance to obtain God's pardon for their sin. It was further decreed that the different circumstances of the sin of each individual ought to be inquired into, in order that the duration of their course of penance might be regulated accordingly, that those who had for a long time resisted the violence of the torture should be treated with more lenity; and they judged that three years of penance ought to suffice in order to render these admissible to communion.

At this council several articles or canons were drawn up, and afterwards forwarded in writing to every bishop. Baronius thinks that these were the same with those afterwards styled the "Penitential Canons."

With respect to bishops and others of the clergy who had either sacrificed or had received certificates of having done so, it was determined that they might be admitted to penance; but that they should be forever excluded from the priesthood, and from all exercise of their office, or of any ecclesiastical function. It was also determined that the communion ought to be administered to persons who might be visited with mortal sickness during the course of their term of penance.

Novatus and Felicissimus were both condemned in this council, which continued sitting for a long time. See Labbe, Concil. i, 714.

V. Held in 255. Eighteen bishops of Numidia having applied to St. Cyprian for advice upon the subject of baptism, those who had received the form out of the Church being anxious to be received regularly: he, with the assent of the council, replied that they ought, by all means, to follow the ancient practice, which was to baptize every one received into the Church, who had previously been baptized only by heretics or schismatics (Cyprian, Epist. 79). See Labbe, Concil. i, 761.

VI. Another council was held in September in the same year (255), attended by eighty-seven bishops from the provinces of Africa, Numidia, and Mauritania. The letter of Jubayen, who had written to consult St. Cyprian upon the subject of baptism, was read, and likewise the answer of Cyprian. Also the letter of Cyprian and the former council to Stephen was read, and the answer of the latter. It does not appear that this answer, although accompanied by threats of excommunication, had the effect of shaking the opinion of Cyprian.

After these papers had been read, Cyprian delivered a discourse, in which, forcibly, yet mildly, testifying his disapproval of the conduct of those who would, as it were, make themselves bishops over other bishops, in wishing to compel them, by a tyrannical fear, to submit absolutely to their opinion, he again protested that he left to each full liberty in his faith as to the subject before them, without judging or desiring to separate them from communion with himself on that account. The other bishops present then delivered their opinion, afterwards Cyprian himself declared his own, and all agreed unanimously.

Nevertheless, pope Stephen, filled with anger, refused even to grant an audience to the deputies of the council, and Cyprian wrote upon the subject to Firmilian, bishop of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia. The latter, in his answer, declares twice, that in his opinion the pope had entirely broken peace with Africa; and that he did not fear to assert that Stephen, by the very act of separating all others from his communion, had, in fact, separated himself from all the other faithful, and therefore from the communion of the Catholic Church; and, by so doing, had really become himself schismatical. This contest lasted until the pontificate of Sixtus, who succeeded Stephen, and it seems that the bishops of Africa, little by little, yielded their opinion. St. Jerome says, that many of the same bishops who had declared in council the invalidity of heretical baptism, afterwards concurred in a contrary decree. See Labbe, Concil. i, 786.

VII. Was held in 348 or 349, after a great number of the Donatists had united themselves to the Church, under Gratus, bishop of Carthage. Bishops from all the provinces of Africa attended it, but neither their number nor the names of the greater part of them have come down to us.

Gratus having returned thanks to Almighty God for the termination of the schism which had for so many years rent the African Church, they proceeded to publish fourteen canons. The first forbids to rebaptize those who have been baptized in the name of the Sacred Trinity; the second forbids to honor those as martyrs who, by their indiscretion, have been instrumental in bringing about their own death, and treats generally of the honor due to the martyrs; the third and fourth forbid the clergy to dwell with women; it was also ruled, that three bishops are necessary in order to judge a deacon, six for the trial of a priest, and twelve for that of a bishop. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 713.

VIII. Held in 390, by Genethlius, bishop of Carthage. The number of the bishops present is unknown. They first drew up a profession of the Catholic faith, and then proceeded to publish thirteen canons.

The 1st enjoins belief in the Holy Trinity.

The 2d enjoins continence upon all the clergy.

The 3d forbids the consecration of the chrism by priests, as also the consecration of virgins, and the reconciliation of penitents at public mass by them.

The 4th orders that those of the clergy receiving persons who have been excommunicated by any bishop, without his permission, shall also be excommunicated.

The 12th forbids the consecration of a bishop without the consent of the metropolitan.

From the canons of this council it appears, plainly, that the bishop was the ordinary minister in cases of penance, and the priest only in his absence, or in cases of necessity. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1158.

IX. Held Aug. 28, 397, under Aurelius, the bishop, at the head of forty-four or forty-eight bishops, among whom was St. Augustine. They published fifty canons.

The 1st orders every bishop to ascertain from the primate, yearly, the day upon which the festival of Easter should be celebrated.

The 2d enjoins that a council be held annually.

The 3d directs that all the bishops and clergy shall acquire a knowledge of the canons of the Church before their consecration.

The 4th forbids the ordination of deacons or the velling of the consecrated virgins before their twenty-fifth year.

The 6th forbids the administration of baptism or the eucharist to the dead.

The 21st forbids any bishop to ordain the clergy of another diocese.

The 29th orders that mass be said fasting.

The 34th allows the baptism of sick persons unable to speak, if their desire of this be guaranteed by their friends.

The 39th forbids the consecration of a bishop by less than three bishops.

The 46th forbids the translation of bishops.

The 47th canon forbids the reading of anything in the Church under the name of sacred Scripture, except the canonical writings, among which are included the apocryphal books of Tobit, Judith, the Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, and the two books of Maccabees. St. Augustine's "whole canon of Scripture," in his treatise De Doctrina Christiana, is identical with the list contained in this forty-seventh canon of the Council of Carthage, at which that father was present.

See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1165.

X. Held Nov. 8, 398, under Aurelius of Carthage, at the head of two hundred and fourteen or two hundred and fifteen bishops, including St. Augustine. One hundred and four canons were published, chiefly relating to the life and conduct of the clergy.

The 1st enjoins that no one be elevated to the episcopate without accurate inquiry first made as to his faith and moral character, in order to ascertain whether he hold the Catholic faith, and have all the virtues necessary for the office; whether he be prudent, docile, moderate, chaste, sober, charitable, humble, well instructed in the word of God, etc.

The eight canons following are upon the ordination of bishops, priests, deacons and sub-deacons, acolytes, exorcists, etc.

The 15th directs that bishops shall have nothing but what is plain and simple, either at table or in their furniture, and recommends that they should distinguish themselves only by the lustre of their faith and virtue.

The 16th prohibits bishops from reading the works of heathens, but allows those of heretics to be read in case of necessity.

The 22d forbids that a bishop should ordain any one without the consent of his clergy, and the testimony of the laity.

The 34th orders that all persons leaving the church during the time of sermon be excommunicated.

The 34th forbids a bishop, while seated, to keep a priest standing.

The 38th permits a deacon, in cases of great necessity, to administer the eucharist in the presence of a priest.

The 51st and two following canons order the clergy to get their living by some honest trade.

The 61st orders that a clergyman swearing by any creature be severely rebuked, and if he continues in fault he is to be excommunicated.

The 64th declares those persons not to be Catholics who fast upon Sunday.

The 66th enjoins that the clergy who consider themselves harshly treated by their bishop, may appeal to a synod.

The 70th forbids all the clergy to keep company with heretics and schismatics.

The 83d directs that greater respect be paid to old people, and to the poor, than to others.

The 84th allows every person whatever, whether heretic, Jew, or pagan, to remain in church until the mass of the catechumens.

The 93d and 94th order that the offerings of those who are at variance, or those who oppress the poor, be rejected.

The 99th forbids a woman, however well instructed and holy, to presume to teach in an assembly of men.

See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1196.

XI. Held about the year 401, in June, by Aurelius, at the head of sixty-two bishops. It was agreed that deputies should be sent to Rome and to Milan, to submit for approval a scheme for putting into the order of clergy the children of Donatists who had been converted. The great scarcity of clergy in Africa arose chiefly from the oppression of the Donatists, and the extreme caution of the bishops in making choice of fit persons. Fifteen canons were drawn up, one of which directs that the bishop shall live at his cathedral church. The decree concerning the continence of the clergy was confirmed. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1241.

XII. This council was held Sept. 13, 401, to consult upon the best method of acting towards the Donatists. It was resolved (1) to treat them with lenity, and (2) that those of the Donatist clergy who desired to resume their ministerial functions in the Church should be received. Afterwards the council drew up certain rules of discipline. Some suppose that these canons were drawn up at another council in the same year.

1. The canon made in the Council of Carthage, A.D. 390, which forbids the marriage of bishops, priests, and deacons, was confirmed, and its observance enforced under pain of deposition. In the case of other ecclesiastics, it was ruled that each Church should follow its own custom in the matter.

2. It was forbidden to any bishop to change the place of his see, or to absent himself from it for long together.

3. It was ordered, that whenever it became necessary to convoke a general council, all the bishops of each province should assemble previously, in two or three classes, from each of which deputies should be chosen, who should be obliged to proceed forthwith to the council, or to communicate the cause of their absence.

4. That such of the clergy as should be refused communion, and deposed, on account of any crime committed, should be allowed the space of one year wherein to justify themselves; which not being done within the year, they should never be received again.

5. That if any bishop should make any strangers, not his relatives, or even his relatives, if they were heretics or heathens, his heirs, in preference to the Church, he should be anathematized after his death. This is to be understood of that property only which the eighth canon of the Council of Hippo permitted him to dispose of by will: viz., his patrimony, and property which had been given to him.

6. In order to prevent superstition, it was resolved to allow of no altar or chapel in honor of a martyr, except his body was actually there buried, or except he had lived or had suffered there; and that all altars should be destroyed which had been erected upon the strength of pretended revelations.

It is not known what bishops were present in this council, but there is good reason to believe that the number was large, and that Alypius, St. Augustine, and Euodius were of the number. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1242.

XIII. This council was held Aug. 25, 403; at which Alypius, St. Augustine, and Possidius were present. The Donatists were invited to a conference, but they rejected the offer with contempt, upon the pretence that they could not confer with sinners. As a consequence the fathers in council were obliged, through their legates, the bishops Euodius and Theasius, to require from the emperor Honorius that laws should be enacted against the Donatists. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1331.

XIV. Was held Aug. 23, 405. It was resolved that letters should be written to the governors of the provinces, begging them to labor to effect union throughout Africa. A letter to the emperor was also agreed upon, thanking him for the expulsion of the Donatists. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1331.

XV. At this council, held in 407, deputies were present from every province in Africa. By common consent it was agreed to annul the canon of Hippo, which decreed that a general African council should be held annually, on account of the difficulty of getting to the council. It was further ruled, that when any circumstance arose affecting the whole Church of Africa, the matter should be communicated in writing to the bishop of Carthage, who should thereupon convoke a council, in which it might be determined what should be done; that other matters should be considered and determined in their own province; that in case of an appeal, each party should name their own judges, from whose decision there should be no further appeal. In order to prevent the bishops from going to the emperor's court more than was absolutely necessary, the council ordered that the cause should be specified in the letter to the Roman Church, given to every bishop journeying to Rome, and that, when at Rome, a letter for the court should be given to him; that if any bishop, having received a commendatory letter for his voyage to Rome, without saying that he intended to go to the court, should nevertheless go thither, he should be separated from communion. It was also ruled, that no new see should be erected without the consent of the bishop out of whose diocese it was to be formed, and that of the primate and whole council of the province. Rules were also laid down concerning the converted Donatists; the council further deputed the bishops Vincentius and Fortunatianus to attend the emperor in the name of the whole African Church, and to defend the cause of the Church in the conference with the Donatists, and also to demand of the emperor five advocates to defend the interests of the Church. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1333.

XVI. Held June 1, 411, with a view to uniting the Donatists to the Catholic Church, and convincing them of the necessity of seeking for salvation therein.

These heretics appear to have increased to such a degree in Africa, that they were in a fair way to overwhelm the Catholics altogether, and from the time of their obtaining full liberty they were guilty of acts of violence equal to those of the greatest persecutors.

The Catholic bishops having at last persuaded the emperor Honorius to allow a public conference with the Donatists, Marcellinus was sent over to Africa by order of that prince, who appointed June 1 for the day of meeting. He also ordered that seven bishops only, on each side, should take part in the conference, to be chosen by the whole number, but that each party might have seven other bishops, with whom the disputants might take counsel, if they needed it; that no other bishop should be permitted to take part in the conference than the fourteen disputants; and, lastly, that each party should bind itself to stand by the acts of those whom they had named to represent them, and that notes of what passed should be taken by public notaries.

The Donatists, however, refused these terms, and desired that all their bishops should be present. The Catholics, on their part, wrote to Marcellinus, accepting his offers. In this letter they declare their object to be to show that the holy Church throughout all the world cannot perish, however great may be the sins of those who are members of it; and, further, they declare their willingness, if the Donatists can show that the Catholic Church is reduced to their communion, to submit themselves entirely to them, to vacate their sees and all their rights; but if the Catholics, on the other hand, can show that the only true Church is in their communion, and that the Donatists are in error, that they will, nevertheless, preserve to them the episcopal honor; that in cities where there are both a Catholic and a Donatist bishop, both shall sit alternately in the episcopal chair, and that when one of the two shall die, the survivor shall remain sole bishop. Then they named, as their representative bishops in the conference, Aurelius of Carthage, Alipius of Tagaste, Augustine, Vincentius of Capua, Fortunatus of Ciritha, Fortunatianus of Sicea, and Possidius of Calama. Seven others were also named for consultation, and four more as sureties that the result of the conference should be observed faithfully. The Donatists also (being compelled) named their representatives in the same order.

In the second sitting, after a long discussion, a delay was granted to the Donatists.

In the third sitting the Donatists did everything in their power to prevent the question of the origin of the schism being inquired into; but Marcellinus caused the statement of Anulinus the proconsul to be read, in which he set forth the complaints of the Donatists against Cæcilianus. The Donatists, being thus hard pushed, presented a memorial, in which they endeavored to show, from holy Scripture, that bad pastors are spots and defilements in the Church, and that she cannot have among her children any that are openly wicked. After this document had been read, the Catholics answered it through Augustine. He strongly established this verity, that the Church in this world must endure evil members, both open and concealed, and that the good, although they are mingled with the evil, do not participate in their sin. From Cyprian he showed that it was in the Church that the devil sowed the tares (which was contested by the Donatists), the object of the Catholics being to prove that neither the faults of Cæcilianus nor of any one else could in any way affect their communion. Augustine then proceeded to say that holy Scripture may not be so interpreted as to contradict itself, and that those passages which each party brought forward in support of their own views must in some way be reconciled. He showed that the Church is to be regarded in two lights: first, as she is, militant in this world, having within her both good and bad men; and, secondly, as she will be, triumphant in heaven, when all evil shall be purged out of her; he also explained how the faithful are bound in this life to separate from the evil, viz. by withdrawing from all participation in their evil deeds, not by separating from them outwardly.

When the Donatists found themselves too closely pressed by the reasoning of Augustine, they declared plainly that they did not conceive themselves to be permitted to join in any act of devotion with those who were not perfectly just, and true saints, for which reason they regarded the holy sacraments as utterly null and void, except they were administered by persons whom they conceived to be of irreproachable life, and for the same cause they insisted upon rebaptizing Catholics. Augustine, in reply, showed plainly that such a notion went at once to overthrow all external religion whatever, since difficulties without end must arise upon the question of the personal holiness of ministers.

They now proceeded to inquire into the original cause of the rupture between the Donatists and Catholics. The former maintained that they were justified in separating from Cæcilianus, who had been consecrated by men who were themselves "Traditores." However, the proofs which they alleged were without weight, and Augustine, in few words, again refuted their error, and further unravelled all their tricks and shifts. He bade them bear in mind that Mensurius, the predecessor of Cæcilianus, although charged with the same crime of having given up the sacred volumes, was yet never publicly condemned; that the Council of Carthage against Cæcilianus condemned him in his absence, and that this was done by bishops who in the Council of Ciritha had been pardoned for the very same crime; in proof of which he caused the acts of the Council of Ciritha, A.D. 305, to be read.

After various shifts on the part of the Donatists in the matter of this last-mentioned council, the acts of the Council of Rome, in 313, absolving Cæcilianus, were read, and also the letter of Constantine to Eumalus, upon the subject of the contradictory judgment which that prince had given in the matter of Cæcilianus. It seemed, indeed, as M. Tillemont observes, as if the Almighty constrained the Donatists to speak in spite of themselves, since the very document which they produced served only to bring out more clearly the innocence of Cæcilianus; for, first, wishing to show that Constantine, after having absolved Cæcilianus, had condemned him again by a later judgment, they were blind enough to produce a petition which they had formerly addressed to the prince, in which it appeared that he had himself condemned them, and maintained the innocence of Cæcilianus; secondly, they produced a letter of Constantine, in which he acknowledges that the cause of Felix of Aptonga had not been examined and judged impartially, and in which he ordered that Inquitius, who confessed that he had told a lie, should be sent to him, in order to bring about the condemnation of Felix.

Now, nothing could better serve the cause of the Catholics and more confound the Donatists than to show that this very Felix was in truth innocent of the charge upon which he had been condemned; for, simply considered, their charge against Cæcilianus was, that he had been consecrated by a man who had delivered up the Holy Scriptures. But, to complete the proof of the innocence of Felix, the Catholics produced the statement of the proconsul (Elianus, who had acted as judge in the affair, and the very acts of the judgment, to none of which had the Donatists anything to object; and finally, the Catholics having entirely established everything that they had asserted, Marcellinus gave sentence, two hundred and eighty-one articles of which still remain to us; it was to the effect that the Donatists had been entirely refuted by the Catholics; that Cæcilianus had been justified, and that, even had the crimes with which he had been accused been proved against him, it would in no way have affected the Catholic Church; and that, accordingly, those of the Donatists who should refuse to unite themselves to the Church should be punished as the laws directed.

From this sentence the Donatists appealed to the emperor, but in vain. Honorius confirmed the acts of the conference of Carthage by a law, bearing date Aug. 30, 414.

This conference may be said to have given the death-blow to Donatism. From this time the sectarians came in crowds to unite themselves to the true Church, and the heresy declined. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1335.

XVII. Held in 412, against Cœlestius, the disciple of Pelagius. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1510.

XVIII. Held in 416, against Pelagius and Cœlestius. It was composed of sixty-seven bishops, whose names are preserved; Aurelius of Carthage presiding. The letters of Heros and Lazarus were read, in which they accused Pelagius and Cœlestius of errors worthy to be visited with the censures of the Church. Then the acts of the Council of 412, against Cœlestius, were read. It was finally resolved that both he and Pelagius should be anathematized, unless they would unequivocally abjure their wicked doctrine. A synodical letter was also addressed to pope Innocent, to inform him of the affair, in order that he might add the weight of his authority to their decree. In this letter the principal errors of Pelagius are specified and refuted summarily from Holy Scripture; to it were added the letters of Heros and Lazarus, and the acts of the Council of 412, in which Cœlestius was condemned. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1533.

XIX. Held by Aurelius in 418; composed of two hundred and seventeen or two hundred and fourteen bishops. Here eight doctrinal articles, drawn up by Augustine, were agreed to against the Pelagians. These articles or canons have come down to our time, and are dated May 1, 418. The last three definitively declare that no man can be said to be without sin, and anathematize those who should deny it. Besides these canons, the oldest Roman code adds another, by which the council condemns with anathema those who hold that infants dying without baptism enjoy a happy existence, although not in the kingdom of heaven. Photius, who, as Tillemont observes, we must believe to have had the use of good MSS., recognises this canon; and, as a further proof of its genuineness, Augustine, in his letter to Boniface, says, that both councils and popes had condemned the heresy of the Pelagians, who maintained that infants not baptized enjoy a place of salvation and repose out of heaven.

In this same council ten other canons were agreed to against the Donatists. It was determined, that in places containing both Catholics and Donatists, each party recognising a different diocesan, the Donatists, at whatever period they might have been converted, should belong to the bishopric which the original Catholics of the place recognised. That if a Donatist bishop should be converted, those parishes where the Donatists had been under his jurisdiction, and the Catholics under the bishop of some other city, should be equally divided between the two bishops, the oldest to make the division, and the other to have the choice. The same council determined, by another remarkable canon, that if the priests and other inferior clergy had any complaint to make against the judgment of their bishop, their case might be judged by the neighboring bishops, from whose decision they might appeal either to the primate or to the Council of Africa; but if they pretended to appeal to any authority beyond the sea, all persons in Africa were forbidden to communicate with them. It also gave permission to a virgin to take the veil and the vows before the age of twenty-five, in cases where her chastity was endangered by the power of those who sought her in marriage, provided also that those upon whom she was dependent made the demand as well as herself.

Since the bishops at this council waited to see what steps the new pope Zosimus would take in the matter of the Pelagians, the chief of them continued at Carthage, and thus formed there for some time a sort of general council. In the end, Zosimus, perceiving that he had permitted himself to be taken in by the Pelagians, gave his sentence, confirming the decrees of the African council; and, in accordance with the judgment of pope Innocent, his predecessor, he condemned afresh Pelagius and Cœlestius, reduced them to the rank of penitents, upon condition that they abjured their errors, and, in case of refusal, sentenced them to be entirely cut off from the communion of the Church. He also wrote a very long epistle to all the churches of the world, which all the Catholic bishops subscribed. The emperor Honorius issued a decree against the Pelagians, and added the weight of his authority to the decision of the Church.

At the head of these decrees, the bishops wrote to Zosimus, the pope, declaring that they were resolved that the sentence passed by his predecessor Innocent against Pelagius and Cœlestius should remain in force against them, until both of them should clearly recognise the necessity of divine grace, agreeably to the decrees of the council; and that so they need never hope to return into the bosom of the Church without abjuring their errors. They also reminded the pope of the mean opinion which Innocent had of the Council of Diospolis, and represented to him that he ought not to have given ear so readily to the representations of a heretic. Lastly, they laid before him all that had passed in Africa upon the subject. This letter was carried to Rome by Marcellinus, subdeacon of Carthage. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1576.

XX. Held May 15, 419, in the Basilica of Faustus, was convoked by Aurelius, bishop of Carthage, assisted by the primate of Numidia, and Faustinus, legate of the pope. Deputies from the different provinces of Africa, and the bishops of the proconsular province were present, making in all two hundred and seventeen bishops; Aurelius presiding, and Augustine being present.

At the first sitting the pope's instructions to his legates were read, and also the canon, which he brought forward in order to show that all bishops have a right of appeal to the pope. First, it was agreed that the pope should be written to, in order to secure an authentic copy of the canons. Secondly, all that related to the case of appeals was read, and Augustine promised that it should be observed until they had received more authentic copies of the Council of Nicæa. Thirdly, the Nicene creed was read, together with twenty ordinary canons, and the several regulations made by the African councils held under Aurelius. Fourthly, the affair of Apiarius (q. v.) was discussed, and the right of appeal to Rome denied. The bishops further desired that the clergy should make complaint of judgments passed upon them to the primate or council of the province, and not to the bishops of the neighboring provinces. Finally, Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, and Atticus, of Constantinople, delivered to the priests deputed by the council faithful copies of the acts of the Council of Nicæa.

In the second sitting six canons were drawn up, relating to the charges that might be alleged against clerks. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1589.

XXI. It is doubtful whether this council, held in 424, was not merely a continuation of the preceding. It was called to attend to the business of Apiarius, mentioned in the account of the preceding council. After having been re-established by the foregoing council, he was again guilty of great enormities, and, accordingly, a second time excommunicated, and driven out of Trabuca, a city in the proconsulate of Africa, whence he fled to Rome. The pope Cœlestine, giving credit to everything that he was pleased to pretend in the way of justification, readmitted him to communion, and added further a letter to the bishops of Africa. This conduct on the part of the pope caused the whole of the African bishops to assemble at Carthage, and to hold there a general council. Out of the whole number present we have the names of only fifteen. Apiarius appeared with Faustinus, who acted rather as his advocate than his judge. He wished them to promise to receive Apiarius into communion with them; but the fathers in council judged that they ought first to examine into his criminal conduct. Apiarius eventually confessed the crimes of which he had been guilty, and was excommunicated. The council ordered a letter sent to pope Cœlestine, in which they complained of his conduct in absolving Apiarius; begged of him in future not to listen so easily to those who came to him from Africa, nor receive into communion those whom they had excommunicated; and lastly, requested the pope to send no more legates to execute his judgments, lest the pride of the world be introduced into the Church of Christ. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1638.

XXII. Held in 525, under pope Boniface, in order to restore the discipline of the Church. On this occasion an abridgment of the canons made under Aurelius was read. The last three forbid all appeals beyond the sea, absolutely, without making any distinction between bishops and others. See Labbe, Concil. iv, 1628.

XXIII. Held in 535; composed of two hundred and seventeen bishops; convoked to Carthage by Reparatus, bishop of that city. A demand was made upon the emperor Justinian to restore the rights and property of the Church, which had been usurped by the Vandals, which request was granted, by a law bearing date Aug. 1 in the same year. See Labbe, Concil. iv, 1784.

XXIV. In the year 645 a conference was held between Pyrrhus, bishop of Constantinople, the chief of the Monothelites, and the abbot, Maximus, in the presence of the patrician Gregory and several bishops. Maximus there showed that there were two wills (due voluntates) and two operations in Jesus Christ. Pyrrhus yielded to his proofs, and went afterwards to Rome, where he retracted what he had formerly taught, and was received into communion; subsequently, however, he returned to his errors.

XXV. Held in the year 646. Several councils were held in Africa during this year, against the Monothelites; one in Numidia, another in Byzacena, a third in Mauritania, and a fourth at Carthage (sixty-eight bishops present), in the proconsular province. See Labbe and Cossart, Concilii Sacrosancta (Paris, 1671).

Carthagena, Don Alfonso de, a Spanish prelate, was born a Jew. He was a son of Paulus Burgensis (q. v.), and was baptized, together with his three brothers, at the time when his father professed Christianity, in 1392. After his father's death he succeeded him in the bishopric. When the Council of Basle was convened, in 1431, he was a representative of Castile, and was treated with great honor, on account of his talents and distinguished excellence. Eneas Sylvius, afterwards pope Pius II, called him, in his memoirs, "an ornament to the prelacy." Pope Eugenius IV, learning that the bishop of Burgos was about to visit Rome, declared in full conclave "that in the presence of such a man he felt ashamed to be seated in St. Peter's chair." Spanish historians speak very highly of him. He died in 1456. Among his writings we notice, Chronicles of the Kings of Spain:—A Treatise on Christian Morality; or, Instruction for Knights, and Memorials of Virtue; both of the foregoing works were written in Latin and Spanish, and dedicated to prince Edward, afterwards king of Portugal:—Commentary on the 26th Psalm:—Homily on Prayer. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Da Costa, Israel and the Gentiles, p. 323 sq. (R. P.)

left the Jesuit order to enter that of the Observantine Franciscans, and became professor of theology at Salamanca, then at Rome. He died at Naples in 1617, leaving Pro Ecclesiastica Libertate et Potestate Tuenda (Rome, 1607):—Propugnaculum Catholicum, etc. (ibid. 1609):—Homiliæ Catholicæ (ibid. eod.; Paris, 1616):—De Sacris Arcanis Deiparæ (Cologne, 1613, 1618; Paris, 1614–15):—Præcis Orationis Mentalis (Venice and Cologne, 1618). Carthaginians, MYTHOLOGY OF. The Carthaginians had, like their progenitors, the Phœnicians, a very imperfect mythology. The account which the Romans or Greeks give us is, therefore, doubtful, as they always identified other deities with their own. So much, however, is certain, that the religion of the Carthaginians was a branch of the fire and star worship which was universal in Phœnicia and the Orient. In general, like the Greeks and Romans, they had a kind of Polytheism of a rough, barbaric nature. Their supreme god seems to have been Moloch, or Baal (q. v.), the sun, whom all the tribes of Canaan and the neighboring countries worshipped under this name. Astarte, the second principal deity, was the receiving principle; her worship was even wilder and more prodigate than the worship of Venus in Cythera, or the worship of Anaitis (q. v.); and Carthage was therefore called by the Romans Regnum Veneris. This cultus lasted long after Christianity had sprung up. The emperor Constantine, and, later, Theodosius, were obliged to publish edicts against it. A third deity was Melcarth, who seems to bear the closest relation to the Tyrian Hercules. The worship of Esmun is compared to that of Æsculapius. The worship of Ceres and Proserpine came from Sicily, and that of Iolaus from Sardinia, the oldest colony of Carthage. Native heroes, however, are Dido and Hamilcar, who had temples in Carthage. The Carthaginians, like the Romans, had their field-worship, their tabernaculum augurale, under a tent, beside an altar which, in important ceremonies, was turned into a funeral pile, or pyre. It is certain that the Penates and Lares were domestic deities of the Carthaginians; they took them along on journeys, for Hannibal had so many and such large idols that he was able to hide his treasures in them, when he fled from Crete. The Carthaginians considered the mountain-tops as habitations of the gods, and gave them names, as if they were the car or throne of the deities. They did not have a separate caste of priests, like the Egyptians and Indians. Their generals, high officials, and kings performed the sacrifices. The Carthaginians, although for over seven hundred years a powerful nation, still, on account of their barbaric and bloody religion, made no progress in civilization, and by their human sacrifices they became an object of abhorrence. The superstition of the people was of a wild and inhuman nature, and cruel both to foreigners and natives. Many a Carthaginian general died on the cross because he was unsuccessful in battle; besieged tribes were horribly misused; often the inhabitants of large cities were cut down without respect to age or sex; the corpses were torn from the graves, the temples destroyed, the statues of the deities broken to pieces, and if they were of precious metal, they were melted and carried off. Such acts of violence, however, were common in many other ancient nations. See PHœNICIA.

Cartier, Gallus, a French Benedictine, was born at Porentruy, in Franco-Switzerland, April 8, 1693. In 1717 he took holy orders, and was for some time professor of philosophy and theology at the monastery of Ettenheim-Münster, in the Breisgau, and at Gengenbach. He died April 17, 1777. He was one of the most learned Benedictines of the last century, and wrote, Tract. Theol. de S. Scriptura (1736):—Auctoritas et Infallibilitas Summor. Pontif. (1738):—Universal. Concionandi Scientia (1749, 2 vols.):—Philosophia Electica

(1756):—Theologia Universalis (1757, 5 vols.). See Werner, Geschichte der Katholischen Theologie; Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie, iv, 36 sq.; Sachs in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Cartier, Germanus, a German Benedictine and prior at Ettenheim, where he died, Feb. 18, 1749, is the author of Dilucidatio Psalmody Ecclesiastica. Brevarii Monastici Dispositio Occurrentia (Freiburg, 1734):—Biblia S. Vulgatæ Editionis (Constance, 1751, 4 vols.). See Ziegelbauer, Hist. Litter. Ord. S. Benedicti; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Cartigny, JEAN, a Flemish theologian of the order of Carmelites, was born about 1520. He was professor of theology at Brussels in the convent of his order, of which he became prior. In 1564 he was sent to Rome as delegate from his province to the general chapter. He died at Cambrai in 1580, leaving, Commentaires sur l'Écriture Sainte:—Traité des Quatre Fins de l'Homme (Antwerp, 1558, 1573). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cartledge, SAMUEL, a Baptist minister, was born at Pedee, N. C., in June, 1750. When he was about thirteen years of age his father removed to Columbia County, Ga. He received his religious impressions under the exhortations of Mrs. Marshall, wife of Rev. Daniel Marshall, when her husband, in 1771, was arrested for preaching in St. Paul's parish, and was baptized by Mr. Marshall in 1777. Although for many years he had been very active in promoting the interests of his denomination, he was not ordained till 1789, and soon after removed to South Carolina, where he was pastor of Plumb Branch Church about fifty years. In 1843 he visited Columbia County, Ga., on horseback, and preached as usual, but was thrown from his horse, and died soon afterwards. See Campbell, Georgia Baptists; Haynes, Baptist Cyclop. i, 153. (J. C. S.)

Cartophyllus. See CARTAPHILUS.

Cartularius, in a monastic or ecclesiastical establishment, is the keeper of the papers and archives. This officer, in the Church of Constantinople, was called Chartophylax (q. v.). The cartularius of Rome presided at ecclesiastical judgments in the place of the pope. Gregory the Great sent his cartularius into Africa to hold a synod.

Cartulary (veterum chartarum volumen) is a book containing a collection of the originals, or copies, of contracts of sale and exchange, deeds, privileges, immunities, and other monuments and papers, relating to churches, monasteries, etc. The most ancient known cartulary is that of the abbey of St. Bertin, at St. Omer, compiled, according to Mabillon, by Folquinus, a monk of that abbey, at the end of the 10th century. The most noted in Italy are those of Monte Cassino and Farsa. That of Compostella, in Spain, was put together about 1120. In the library at Turin is a cartulary entitled, Chrysobulle et Argyrobulle, being a collection of diplomas of the Greek emperors, which formerly belonged to some monastery. It is signed at the end by the emperor and patriarch. Of the numerous cartularies which still exist, relating to monastic foundations in England, a list has been printed by Sir Thomas Phillips, Bart., of Middle Hill.

The term cartulary is sometimes extended to include any monastic record-book, and is likewise applied to the receptacle or room in which such documents are kept.

Cartwright, Edmund, D.D., F.R.S., an English clergyman, was born at Marnham, Nottinghamshire, April 24, 1743, and was educated at Wakefield Grammar-school. His academical studies were begun at Oxford, in University College, and in 1762 he was elected a demy of Magdalen College, where, in 1764, he succeeded to a fellowship. He published, in 1770, Armist and Elvira, a legendary tale in verse, which passed through seven editions in little more than a year. In 1779 he published his best poetical production, The Prince of Peace. In the same year he was presented to the rectory of Goadby Marwood, Leicestershire, to which was added a prebend in the cathedral of Lincoln. Dr. Cartwright probably would have passed an obscure life as a country clergyman, had not his attention been turned, in 1784, to the possibility of applying machinery to weaving. He invented the power-loom, for which a patent was granted in 1785. In 1796 he settled in London. The first mill on his plan was that of Messrs. Grimshaw, of Manchester. About 1807 parliament voted him a grant of £10,000, in consideration of his having contributed so largely to the commercial prosperity of the nation. He also invented machines for combing wool and making ropes, and was the author of many improvements in the arts, manufactures, and agriculture. He died near Sevenoaks, Kent, Oct. 30, 1823. See Encyclop. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.

Cartwright, Joseph, an English Baptist, succeeded Thomas Charlton as minister at Mazepond, Southwark. He tried to get into the national Church, but failed; and so took a place in Lant Street, Borough, where he read the church prayers, and preached till his death. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 284.

Cartwright, Peter, a famous pioneer Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Amherst County, Va., Sept. 1, 1785. He removed at the age of eight with his parents to Logan County, Ky., and grew up amid the wild scenes of backwoods life, being more familiar with the axe, rifle, and plough than with books, and hence his education was quite limited. He was converted at a protracted meeting in 1801; received license to exhort in 1802, from bishop Asbury, and removed to Lewiston County, where he entered Brown's academy and received the rudiments of an education, but continued his work as an exhorter, holding forth to large congregations. He was soon licensed to preach, which enlarged his authority but did not increase his labors or usefulness. Leaving his school to form a circuit, he supplied it with preaching, and was thus employed by the presiding elder until 1804, when he was admitted into the Kentucky Conference. His theological studies were begun with Mr. McKendree, afterwards bishop. In 1806 he was ordained a deacon by bishop Asbury, and appointed to Marietta Circuit, O., meeting with hard service and poor fare. His next appointment was Barren Circuit, where he was allowed the first and only vacation he ever enjoyed. In 1808 he was ordained an elder, and in 1812 was appointed presiding elder of Wabash District, and in 1813 of Green River District. Between 1816 and 1820 he travelled circuits in Kentucky, and in 1821 was appointed presiding elder of Cumberland District, which was the beginning of his fifty years in regular succession of presiding eldership. He was a delegate to thirteen general conferences, beginning with 1816. In 1823 he rode on horseback into Illinois to explore the country, and in the following year moved his family to Pleasant Plains; there he continued to reside during the remainder of his eventful life; there he died, Sept. 25, 1872, and there his remains still lie in the soil which he, like Abraham, purchased with his own money. The Illinois Conference was organized in 1824, and Mr. Cartwright, becoming one of its members, was appointed presiding elder, and in that office continued in that conference until, at his own request, in 1869, a superannuated relation was granted him. He was present at first roll-call of forty-five out of the first forty-seven sessions of the Illinois Conference; was a conference visitor six years to McKendree College, three to Illinois Wesleyan University, and one to Garrett Biblical Institute; and was eight years a member of the old Western Conference, eight of the Tennessee Conference, four of the Kentucky Conference, and forty-eight of the Illinois Conference. He took an active part in all the controversies growing out of the presiding-elder question, slavery, lay delegation, etc., being firm in his opposition to all innovations on primitive Methodism; and during the earlier years of his ministry had many controversies with Presbyterians, New Lights, Universalists, Halcions, Mormons, etc. He published two anti-Calvinistic pamphlets, but his principal literary production was his Autobiography, which has had an immense sale, and been translated into German and French, the Revue des deux Mondes regarding it as a romance. While on the Illinois District he was a candidate to the state legislature, and entering with zeal into the campaign, was elected, but soon became disgusted with politics, and returned to his God-appointed work. Few men ever passed a more eventful or toilsome life. For upwards of fifty years he was an indefatigable servant of the Church. Although considered eccentric, he was an acknowledged leader in his conference. In person five feet ten inches high, with a square-built, powerful physical frame, weighing nearly two hundred pounds, an immensely strong and enduring constitution, dark complexion, high cheek bones, small, piercing black eyes, large head, and curly black hair, he naturally appreciated highly the muscular part of Christianity, considering himself one of the Lord's breaking-up ploughs, to drive his way through all kinds of stubborn soil; hence the roughs and disturbers at camp-meetings and elsewhere stood in awe of his brawny arm. Above this there was a moral and kingly power that belongs to all real heroes, which commanded the respect and reverence of all. Mr. Cartwright was a man of superior mental force, a master in interpreting human nature: a preacher warm in sympathy, clear in thought, and often of the highest style of oratory. His speeches were short, pithy, and pointed, exhibiting a scathing sarcasm, a stern indignation, and a piercing wit that defied rejoinder. See Minutes of Annual Conference, 1873, p. 115; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.; also his Autobiography.

Cartwright, William, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Northway, near Tewkesbury, Gloucestershire, in September, 1611. He was educated at the free school of Cirencester, Westminster School, and Christ Church, Oxford. He took holy orders in 1638, and became "the most florid and yet seraphical preacher in the university." In 1642 he was made successor of the church of Salisbury, and in the same year was appointed a delegate to provide for the troops sent by the king to protect the colleges. His zeal in this office caused his imprisonment by the parliamentary forces. In 1643 he was chosen junior proctor of the university and reader in metaphysics. He died Dec. 23 of the same year. He wrote several poetical pieces, among which were The Royal Slave; a Tragedy (1639); — Tragi-Comedies, with other Poems (1640). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Carus, Friedrich August, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born April 26, 1770, at Bosen, in Upper Lausatia. He studied at Leipzig and Göttingen, and in 1793 commenced lecturing at the former place. In 1795 he was made bachelor of theology and morning preacher at the university church. In 1805 he was appointed professor of philosophy, and died Feb. 6, 1807. He wrote, De Accommodatione Christi et Apostolorum (Leipzig, 1793); — De Anaxagore Cosmologia Fontibus (ibid. 1796). After his death were published, Ideen zur Geschichte der Philosophie (ibid. 1809); — Psychologie der Hebräer (ibid. eod. : — Moral- und Religionsphilosophie (ibid. 1810: 2d ed. 1824). See Döring, Die Gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 243 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 285, 429, 596; Lichtenberger, Encyclopädie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Carus, Josephus Maria. See CARO, GIUSEPPE.

Caruthers, Eli Washington, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Rowan County, N. C., Oct. 26, 1798. He was educated at Hampden-Sidney College, Va., and New Jersey College; and graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1820. He was licensed by the New Brunswick Presbytery in the same year; became pastor of Bethel and the adjoining churches in Guilford County, N. C.; of Alamance Church, one of these, for over forty years, resigning in 1861; and died near Greensboro, N. C., Nov. 24, 1865. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 347.

Caruthers, James E., a Presbyterian minister, was a member of the Presbytery of Peoria, and pastor in Yates City, Ill. He died near Poland, O., March 7, 1875, aged 54 years. See Presbyterian, March 27, 1875.

Carvajal (or Çaravagal), Luis de, a Spanish Franciscan, of the order Observantines, in the province of Castile, and theologian of Alcalá, studied at Paris, and attended the Council of Trent, in 1547, where he delivered a discourse, on the second Sunday in Lent, which has been printed at Antwerp. He also wrote an Expostulatory Declamation (in Latin) for the Immaculate Conception (Seville, 1533; Paris, 1541):—Theologicæ Sententiæ, etc. (Cologne, 1545):—Apologia Monastica, against Erasmus (Basle and Paris, 1579).

Carvajal, Tomas José Gonzales, a Spanish statesman and writer, was born Dec. 21, 1753, at Seville, where he studied jurisprudence and philology. At the age of fifty-four he commenced the study of Hebrew, and died Nov. 9, 1834. He was the author of a metrical version of the Psalms, Los Salmos (Valencia, 1819, 5 vols.):—Los Libros Poéticos de la Santa Biblia (ibid. 1827, 6 vols.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Carvalho, Antonio, a Portuguese theologian of the Jesuit order, was born at Lisbon in 1590. He was professor of theology and philosophy at Evora, then at Coimbra, and died in 1650, leaving Si Conviene que los Predicadores Reprehendan Principes y Ministros (Lisbon, 1627):—Commentaria upon the Summa of Thomas Aquinas. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carvalho (da Perada), Antonio, a Portuguese theologian and controversialist, was born in 1595 at Sardoal, in the diocese of Guarda. Having studied theology at Coimbra, he fulfilled successively the functions of arch-priest of the cathedral of Lisbon, of proctor or delegate of the Portuguese clergy to the court of Madrid, and of guardian of the royal archives of Portugal, called Torre do Tombo, and was also apostolic prothonotary. He died at Lisbon, Dec. 12, 1645, leaving Si Conviene el Gobierno Espiritual de las Almas, etc. (Lisbon, 1627), together with some other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carvalho, Juan, a Portuguese author of the early half of the 17th century, was professor of canonical law at Coimbra, and wrote De Quarta Falcidia et Legitima, etc. (Coimbra, 1631). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carvalho, Lorenzo Perez, a Portuguese canonist, who lived at Lisbon at the close of the 17th century, wrote Eucleonænes Ordinum Militarium, etc. (Lisbon, 1693). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carvalho, Miguel de, a Portuguese missionary, was born in 1580. He completed his theological studies at Coimbra, then went East, and in 1602 was in the East Indies. He belonged to the Jesuit order, and having determined to go to Japan, just as the persecution against the Christians began, forced his way as far as Nagasaki, where he preached until obliged by the authorities to cease. He was thrown into prison, and died soon after upon a funeral pile, in 1624. Some of his letters were published under the title Carta ao Padre Provincial, etc. (1624). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carvalho, Tristan Barbosa de, a Portuguese ascetic writer, lived at the commencement of the 17th century. His principal work is Ramillete del Alma y Jardín del Cielo. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carvalho, Valentin, a Portuguese missionary of the Jesuit order, was born in 1560 and died in 1631. He wrote, Supplementum Annuarum Epistolarum ex Japonia, Anno 1600:—Annua Litteræ ex Sinis, Anno 1601, etc. (Rome, 1603). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carvam, CHRISTOVÃO, a Portuguese preacher of the Dominican order, lived in the early half of the 17th century. He was censor of the inquisition, and wrote Sermoens Varios (Florence, 1629). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carve, THOMAS, an Irish Roman Catholic clergyman, was born in the county of Tipperary in 1589 or 1590. He became apostolic notary and vicar-choral of St. Stephen's, Vienna; and, according to some, died in 1664, but, according to others, was living in 1672. His works include, Itinerarium (1639–46, 3 parts):—Res Germanicæ, 1617–41 (1641, 12mo):—Lyra, seu Anacephalæosis Hibernica, etc. (1651):—Responsio Veridica ad Ilotum Libellum (1672). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Carver, Dirick, an English martyr, was burned at Lewes, of the parish of Brighthelmston, in Sussex County. He was examined on many points of the Christian religion and the works of Christ, all of which he firmly believed in, but refused to sign the articles presented him by the bishop concerning the papal Church. He was sent to Newgate prison, where he remained some time in torture. He was burned in a barrel in 1555. His sufferings were horrible, but he bore them most joyfully. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 321.

Carver, James, an English divine, was born at Wymondham, Norfolk. He was conspicuous in youth for integrity and high moral character, and began his ministry in a rural charge in Norfolk. In 1823 he entered upon the curacy of St. Nicholas, Lynn, and the evening lectureship at St. Margaret's; and in 1828 was appointed chaplain to the debtor's prison for London and Middlesex, where, with the exception of six years as ordinary at Newgate, he spent the remainder of his life, and died Jan. 12, 1866. Mr. Carver was sympathetic, courteous, wise, and highly esteemed. See Christian Observer, April, 1866, p. 248.

Carver, Jonathan, an English Baptist minister, was born in 1768. He was ordained pastor of the Baptist Church in Necton, Norfolk, May 23, 1809, where he labored, greatly esteemed for the holy consistency of his character, till his sudden death, Sept. 3, 1840. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1841, p. 31. (J. C. S.)

Carver, Robert, a Congregational minister, was born at Taunton, Mass., April 20, 1810. He graduated at Yale College in 1833, and at Andover in 1836. He preached in Phillipsburg, Ont.; Walden, Vt.; Berlin, Mass.; Pittston, Me.; Lancaster, Wis.; Cutchogue, L. I.; and Raynham, Mass. In 1857 he took charge of the boarding-house of the Wheaton Female Seminary, Norton, Mass. He was subsequently appointed chaplain to the 7th regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, and in 1861 left with them for Washington. His health declined after the campaign of Yorktown, and he was compelled to leave the army. He was conveyed to the house of his father, in Orient, L. I., where he failed rapidly, and died Feb. 28, 1863. "Few excelled him in fidelity as a chaplain, adhering to his post and duty to the last." See Cong. Quarterly, 1863, p. 194.

Cary, Alice, an American authoress, was born in the Miami valley, eight miles north of Cincinnati, O., April 26, 1820. At the age of eighteen she began to write verses, and for ten years made frequent contributions in prose and verse to newspapers and magazines. Attention was first attracted to her by some sketches of rural life published in the National Era. The poems of Alice and her sister, Phoebe Cary, appeared in 1849. In 1850 she removed to New York, where, with her sister, she devoted herself successfully to literary labor. She died in New York, Feb. 12, 1871. Some of her best works are, Clostermook Papers (in two series, 1851 and 1853):—Hagar: A Story of To-day (1852):—Lyra and other Poems (1853):—Married, not Mated (1856):—The Bishop's Son (1867), etc.

Cary, Austin, a Congregational minister, was born at North Bridgewater, Mass., Oct. 1, 1809. He studied at Waterville, Me., graduated at Amherst College in 1837, and at the Theological Institute, Hartford, Conn., in 1840; was ordained Nov. 11, 1840, at Sunderland, Mass., and died there, Nov. 26, 1844. He published a Thanksgiving Sermon, a tract on Sabbath Desecration, and another, which had a wide circulation. See Alumni Record of Conn. Theol. Ins. p. 27. (J. C. S.)

Cary, Benjamin, a Congregational minister, was born at Hopkinton, Mass., in 1732. He graduated at Harvard College in 1761, and was ordained the first minister of the Church in Dover, Mass., Nov. 10, 1762, in which position he remained until his death, Nov. 14, 1811. He was a man of very modest and retiring character. See Hist. of Meriden Association, p. 214. (J. C. S.)

Cary, Henry Francis, A.M., an English author and divine, was born at Gibraltar, December, 1772. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he received his A.M. in 1796; was appointed to the vicarage of Abbots-Bromley, Staffordshire, in 1797, became assistant librarian in the British Museum in 1826, and died in September, 1844. Mr. Cary published, A Translation of Dante's Inferno, Purgatorio, and Paradiso, in English blank verse, with notes:—A Translation of the Birds of Aristophanes, and of the Odes of Pindar:—Lives of English Poets, from Johnson to Kirke White; intended as a continuation of Johnson's Lives:—The Early French Poets; and carefully revised editions of Pope, Cowper, Milton, Thomson, and Young. See The Eng. Rev. (Lond.), 1847, p. 205; Hart, Eng. Manual, p. 505; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors; New Amer. Cyclop. p. 505; Memoir (Lond. 1847).

Cary, James, an English prelate of the 14th and 15th centuries, was born at Cockington, Devonshire, and, while in Rome, was made bishop of Lichfield. On his journey towards England he met the pope at Florence, and received the see of Exeter in exchange; yet Cary enjoyed neither, dying and being buried at Florence in 1419. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 406.

Cary, Josiah Addison, a Presbyterian minister, was born at West Brookfield, Mass., March 29, 1813. He graduated at Amherst College in 1832, and at the Union Theological Seminary in 1839. He was a resident licentiate until 1843, and was ordained May 13, 1844. He was professor in the Deaf and Dumb Institute of New York city (1832-51), and for a time supplied the pulpit of a Dutch Reformed Church in the same city. In 1851 he was appointed principal of the Deaf and Dumb Institute, and, after sustaining this relation for one year, he removed to Columbus, O., where he died, Aug. 7, 1852. See Gen. Cat. of Union Theol. Sem. 1876, p. 12. (W. P. S.)

Cary, Mordecai, an Irish prelate, bishop of Clonfert, was translated to Killala in 1735, and died in 1752. He published a Sermon on James i, 27 (Dublin, 1744). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cary, Phoebe, an American authoress, sister of Alice, was born near Cincinnati, O., Sept. 4, 1824, and died at Newport, R. I., July 31, 1871. When quite young, she contributed largely to periodicals. Her writings were chiefly poetical. Her earliest poem of special worth was Near Home, written in 1842. Her published works, besides the contributions to the volume issued in conjunction with her sister, were, Poems and Parodies (1854):—Poems of Faith, Hope, and Love (1868); and a large portion of the Hymns for all Christians, compiled by the Rev. Dr. Deems in 1869. She wrote a beautiful tribute to her sister's memory, which was published in the Ladies' Repository a few days before her own death.

Cary, Richard M., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Williamsburg, Vt., Dec. 10, 1794. After two or three changes of residence, his father removed, in 1806, to western New York, and settled in Boston, Erie Co., then known as "The Holland Purchase." He was converted in 1816, and soon after became pastor of the Church in Hamburg, N. Y., where he remained for twelve years, having also the pastoral charge of the Church in Zoar. He afterwards performed much evangelistic labor in different sections of the county, and was pastor of a church in what is now Ashford, Cataugaus Co., for twenty years. In 1842 he removed to Johnstown, Rock Co., Wis., which was thereafter his permanent residence. He continued preaching in destitute places, establishing churches, etc., until his death, Oct. 16, 1868. See Barrett, Memoirs of Eminent Preachers, p. 157-170. (J. C. S.)

Cary, Robert, LL.D., an English clergyman and learned chronologer, was born at Cockington, Devonshire, about the year 1615, and educated at Exeter and Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He became rector of Portlemouth, in Devonshire, and affiliated with the Presbyterians of that section during the civil war. He became archdeacon of Exeter, Aug. 18, 1662, but was ejected in about two years, after which he retired to his rectory at Portlemouth, where he died, Sept. 19, 1688. His principal work was entitled Palaeologia Chronica, a chronological account of ancient time, in three parts: 1. Didactical; 2. Apodeictical; 3. Canonical (Lond. 1677). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cary, Samuel, a clergyman of Boston, Mass., who died in 1815, aged thirty, published Sermons, etc. (1806-15). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cary, Thomas, a Congregational minister, was born at Charlestown, Mass., Oct. 18, 1745. He graduated at Harvard College in 1761; was ordained at Newburyport, Mass., as pastor of the First Church, May 11, 1796, and died there, Nov. 24, 1808. "He possessed a strong and comprehensive mind, which was highly cultivated by reading, observation, reflection, and prayer." His only published writings are a few Discourses. See The Panoplist, Dec. 1808. (J. C. S.)

Caryatides, a name given to statues of women, applied instead of columns, in Grecian architecture, as at the Erechtheum at Athens.

Caryātis, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Diana, who had a sanctuary near the pillars of Hermes, and close by Caryä, in Laconia. The place was sacred to Diana and the nymphs, and yearly the Lacedæmonian maidens danced ring-dances around the statue of the goddess, which stood in the open air. Some have thought to find a fac-simile of these Spartan dancers in the Caryatides, or female columnar figures of antique architecture.

Caryophiles (or Carliophyle), JOHN MATTHEW, a Greek prelate and scholar, was born in the isle of Corfu. Having studied at Rome in the college of the Greeks, he returned to his own country, but soon went back to Rome, where he taught in the same college. He entered successively the service of cardinals Aldebrandini, Ludovisio, and Barberini—all three nephews of the popes. The second of these cardinals procured for him the title of archbishop of Icone or Cogni, in the isle of Candia, which he held until his death, at Rome, in 1639. He wrote, Refutatio Pseudo-Christianæ Catechesis Editæ a Zachario Gergano Græco (Rome, 1631):—Censura Confessionis Fidei quæ sub Nomine Cyrilli Patriarchæ Constantinopolitani Circumfertur (ibid. eod.):—Dottrina Cristiana del Cardinale Bellarmini (in Italian and Syriac, ibid. 1633); and a number of other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casa, one of the names anciently used to denote a church, e. g. candida casa, i. e. white church.

Casal, Chrysostom de, a Dominican of the 16th century, who wrote on the immortality of the soul, against Pomponius (Venice, 1525).—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Casal (or Cazal), Gaspar de, a Portuguese prelate, was born at Santarem in 1510. In 1524 he entered the Augustinian order and taught philosophy at Lisbon and at the University of Coimbra. Having received the degree of D.D. in 1542, he was chosen by John III, in 1551, as confessor of the Infant John, and soon after was called to be confessor and counsellor of the king himself. In 1550 he was appointed to the see of Funchal, in Madeira, which he held till Aug. 9, 1555, and then resigned it, without having visited his diocese. He was afterwards made bishop of Coimbra. He assisted at the Council of Trent, and became conspicuous for his wisdom and learning. He wrote, concerning the affairs of the council, De Cæna et Calice Domini (Venice, 1563). The cathedral of Leiria was built at his expense, the first stone of which was laid Aug. 11, 1559. He died Aug. 9, 1587, leaving several works of theology and erudition; among them, Axiomata Christiana (Coimbra, 1550; Venice, 1563):—De Sacrificio Missæ et SS. Eucharistiæ Celebratione (Venice, 1563; Antwerp, 1566):—De Justitia (1563, 4 vols.):—also a commentary on the Topics of Aristotle, and Curtæ a Ruinæ D. Catharina, which was printed in the Memoirs of Barbosa. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Antonii Bibl. Hisp. Novæ, i, 522 sq.; Keller, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Casalanizio, JOSEF DE, a Spanish priest and philanthropist, was born in 1556 at Peralta, in Aragon. He went to Rome, where, seeing many vicious children, he became inspired with the thought of founding an institution for their instruction, which pope Paul V, in 1617, sanctioned as the "Pauline Congregation," and the members of which have been known since 1621 as "Regular Clerks of the Pious Schools." That religious order, suppressed by pope Innocent X, and established again by Clement IX, soon had a large number of colleges in Spain, Italy, Hungary, and Poland. Casalanizio, in renouncing the world, took the name of Brother Joseph of the Mother of God. He died at Rome, Aug. 25, 1648, and was beatified by Benedict XIV, and canonized by Clement XIII. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casali, Andrea, an Italian painter and engraver, was born at Civita Vecchia about 1720, and probably studied under Sebastiano Conca. He died about 1770. He etched several plates: The Virgin and Infant, from Raphael, and Edward the Martyr, from his own design. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Casali, Uberto de, an Italian ascetic writer of the order of Minorites, was born at Casale, and lived in the 14th century. He wrote, Arbor Vitæ Crucifixi Jesu (Venice, 1485); a work rare as well as singular:—De Septem Ecclesiis Statibus (ibid. 1516). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casanata, GERONIMO, an Italian prelate, was born at Naples, June 13 (others say Feb. 13), 1620. He left the bar in order to devote himself to ecclesiastical work.

Innocent X made him his chamberlain, and governor of some of his cities. In 1658, Alexander VII sent him to Malta as inquisitor. In 1673 Clement X made him cardinal, and finally Innocent XII appointed him, in 1693, librarian of the Vatican. Casanata loved literature and encouraged those who cultivated it. He died at Rome, March 3, 1700. He founded the famous "Bibliotheca Casanatensis," by bequeathing his rich library to the Dominicans of the convent of Minerva, with a revenue of four thousand Roman crowns. He wrote Discorso Istoricò sopra l'Origine e Progresso della Regalia. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.

Casanato, MARC ANTONIO ALEGRE DE, a Spanish Carmelite, died in 1658, at the age of sixty-eight, leaving a work entitled The Paradise of Carmelites.

Casanova, JOSE MARIA, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at San Cristobal, state of Nuevo Leon, Mexico. He removed to Texas about 1865; was converted to Protestantism in 1874; and in 1875 was licensed to preach, and sent to start a mission in Concepcion. He continued a faithful missionary until his decease, Oct. 4, 1879. Mr. Casanova was nearly a pure-blooded Indian, and possessed fine preaching abilities. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1879, p. 114.

Casati, Cherubino, an Italian theologian and preacher of the order of Clerks Regulars of St. Paul, was a native of Milan. He entered his order in 1565, and had the control of various colleges, and preached with success in many cities of Italy. He died January, 1618, leaving Il Simbolo Apostolico (Milan, 1615). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casati, Paolo, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Piacenza in 1617. He taught mathematics and theology at Rome and in the colleges of his order, then was sent by his general to Sweden, where he influenced queen Christina to embrace the Catholic religion. On his return he governed several houses of the Jesuits, and was for thirty years at the head of the University of Parma, where he died, Dec. 22, 1707. His principal works are, De Terra Machinis Mota (Rome, 1668):—La Tromba Parlante (Parma, 1673):—De Angelis (Placenza, 1703):—Opticæ Disputationes (Parma, 1705); written when he was blind and eighty-eight years of age. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Casaubon, MÉRIC, a Swiss Calvinistic theologian and critic, son of Isaac Casaubon, was born at Geneva, Aug. 14, 1599. He commenced his studies at the Protestant academy of Sedan, then went with his father to England, where he became distinguished, under the protectorate of Cromwell, by his attachment to the Stuarts. He died July 14, 1671, while rector of Bleton, in the county of Somerset, prebendary of Canterbury, and rector of Ickham. Like his father, he pursued a literary career, and was also one of the most distinguished critics of his time. He wrote, besides, some very scholarly works upon other subjects: Pietas contra Maledictos Patrii Nominis et Religionis Hostes (Lond. 1651):—Vindicatio Patriæ Adversus Impostores (1624). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Casdöë, a martyr of Persia, daughter of king Sapor, is celebrated by the Greeks and Latins Sept. 29, according to Tillemont (vii, 663); but the story is not in the Menology of Basil, and Sozomen knows nothing of it.

Case (or Case), Alexander, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1600; was appointed to the living at Polwarth in 1604; was a member of the General Assembly in 1638, and of the Commission of Assembly in 1644 and 1646. He died after July 28, 1651, aged seventy-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, i, 423.

Case, Charles Z., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Sodus, N. Y., July 21, 1837. He spent his early years on his father's farm; joined the Church at the age of fourteen; studied at Macedon Academy, Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, and Genesee College at Lima, where he graduated in 1861. During these years of study he acted as principal of Walworth Academy, and of the academy at Red Creek, Wayne Co. In 1861 he entered the East Genesee Conference, spent two years as professor of mathematics and ancient languages at Lima, and then, in 1863, began his regular conference duties. From that time until his decease he labored with great application, zeal, and success. He died Oct. 19, 1872. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 129.

Case, Francis Hiram, a Congregational minister, was born at West Simsbury (now Canton), Conn., Oct. 1, 1797. He graduated at Yale College in 1822, and at the Yale Divinity School in 1825. Feb. 1, 1826, he was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Goshen. From this charge he was dismissed, Sept. 30, 1828. He was then for eighteen months an agent of the American Tract Society in the Southern States. Returning to Connecticut, he was installed pastor of the Congregational Church in Avon, Dec. 22, 1830. He was dismissed April 28, 1840, and soon after removed to Whitewater, Wis., where he supplied the pulpit from 1842 to 1844, and where he resided until 1863. He died at Cold Spring, Wis., Dec. 20, 1872. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1873.

Case, John W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at West Greenwich, R. I., July 22, 1798. He was converted at sixteen, and in 1822 was admitted on trial to the New England Conference. When the conference was divided, in 1840, he became a member of the Providence Conference, from which he received laborious appointments with small compensation until 1873, after which he was a supernumerary till 1878, and thereafter a superannuate. With declining health his mind failed, and the last few weeks of his life were spent in the Hartford Retreat for the Insane, where he died, May 13, 1880. His preaching was clear, concise, and practical; his pastorate faithful and useful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 88.

Case, Josiah Leonard, a Congregational minister, was born in New York in 1808. He graduated at Union College in 1836, and at the Andover Theological Seminary in 1839; was ordained Oct. 17, the same year, as pastor at Kingston; and died Nov. 15, the same year. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 137.

Case, Lyman, a Congregational minister, was born at Whiting, Vt., April 13, 1792. He studied theology with Josiah Hopkins and B. Wooster, and was ordained at Coventry, Vt., 1823. After his dismissal from Coventry, he preached in various towns in Vermont and Canada. During the latter part of his life, he was colporteur for the American Tract Society. He died Feb. 27, 1857. See Cong. Quarterly, 1864, p. 32.

Case, Moses Parmelee, a Congregational minister, was born in Vermont in 1819. He graduated at the University of Vermont in 1839, and studied theology a part of a year in Andover Theological Seminary, as a member of the class of 1845. He was a teacher in the high-school of Newburyport, Mass., seven years, and died at Pepperell, Dec. 18, 1859. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 168.

Case, Pierre de. See CASIS.

Case, Thomas, an eminent English Nonconformist divine, was born at Boxley, in Kent, in 1598 or 1599, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He took orders in the Church of England, and preached for some time in Oxfordshire and Kent, and held the living of Erpingham, in Norfolk, from which he was ejected for nonconformity. In 1641 he joined the parliamentary party, and became minister of St. Mary Magdalen, Milk Street, London, and afterwards lecturer at Aldermanbury and St. Giles's, Cripplegate. He was imprisoned six months in the Tower for being implicated in the plot of Christopher Love (q. v.), but was released and restored to his living. He died May 30, 1682. His works consist chiefly of sermons preached on various occasions. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Case, Wheeler, a Presbyterian minister, was licensed to preach by Suffolk Presbytery, settled as first pastor of Pleasant Valley Church, Dutchess Co., N. Y., in November, 1765, and continued there more than twenty years. He died in 1793, leaving a number of poems, written to promote the cause of liberty (republished in New York in 1852). See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Case, William, a Congregational minister, was born in Connecticut in 1796. He graduated from Yale College in 1821; studied theology for two years in Andover Theological Seminary, as a member of the class of 1824, and was ordained Sept. 1 following. He was pastor at Chester, Conn., from 1824 to 1835; stated supply at New Hartford during 1835 and 1836; without charge at East Windsor from 1836 to 1842; stated supply at Middle Haddam from 1842 to 1844; teacher at Haddam from 1844 to 1846; stated supply at North Madison during 1846 and 1847; and without charge from that time until his death at Hartford, April 28, 1858. See Triennial Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 60.

Casel (or Chessel), JOHANN. See CASELIUS.

Caselli, CARLO FRANCESCO, an Italian prelate, was born at Alessandria, Oct. 20, 1740. He entered the order of Servites, became procurator-general, then consulter of the Congregation of Rites, and was one of the signers of the Concordat in 1801. Pius VII raised him to the dignity of bishop of Sidon in partibus, made him cardinal in 1802, and appointed him bishop of Parma in 1804. In 1811 Caselli sat in the Council of Paris. On the fall of Napoleon the empress, Marie Louise conferred upon him the office of private counsellor, with the title of member of the order of St. George. In 1823 he returned to Rome, and was a member of the conclave for the election of a new pontiff. He died April 19, 1828. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casembroodt (or Casenbrot), ABRAHAM, a Dutch painter, lived about 1650. He painted some historical subjects, three of which, representing the Passion of Christ, are in the church of San Giovaquin, at Messina.

Casement, (1) a frame enclosing part of the glazing of a window, with hinges to open and shut. (2) An old English name for the deep hollow moulding, similar to the scotia of Italian architecture, which is extremely prevalent in Gothic architecture, in cornices, door and window-jambs, etc., especially in the Perpendicular style, and which is frequently enriched with running patterns of foliage.

Casey, Hiram, a Baptist minister, was born at Georgia, March 23, 1790. He united with the Church in 1812, and soon began to preach. So neglected had been his education that when he commenced preaching he could scarcely read a hymn or text. In his personal appearance he had everything in his favor. He travelled extensively, not only in Tennessee, but in other parts of the country, having for his companion Rev. John Wiseman, a famous preacher of his times. He was instrumental in building up several churches in Middle Tennessee. In 1824 he moved to Hardeman County, Tenn., and devoted most of his time to ministerial work until his death, Dec. 4, 1828. See Burris, Sketches of Tennessee Ministers, p. 140-145. (J. C. S.)

Cash, Rezin, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of the western shore of Maryland, Montgomery County. In 1794 he entered the travelling connection, and remained faithful until his death, in 1808. Mr. Cash was a man of great solemnity of mind, goodness of heart, and attentive steadfastness in Christian and ministerial duties. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1804, p. 117.

Cash, Thomas, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Alderley, Nov. 13, 1739. He was converted in his twenty-fourth year, and when thirty-two years of age felt himself called of God into the ministry. He travelled through Great Britain, appointing meetings for all who desired to hear the gospel. Having in his secular business acquired a competency, he gave his entire attention to the ministerial work. He died Jan. 16, 1809. See Piety Promoted, iii, 409-413. (J. C. S.)

Cash, Thomas Y., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Warrenton, Fauquier Co., Va. His pious parents led him to give his heart and devote his life to God when but a boy. After spending several years as an earnest, pious Christian, and serving some time as a local preacher, he entered the Virginia Conference in 1848, and labored therein until his death, Feb. 11, 1865. Mr. Cash was remarkable for his devoted, consistent Christian life. He was quiet and unobtrusive, yet wielded a wondrous power. He was sound and clear in Scripture exposition, and fearless in the application of truth. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1865, p. 558.

Cashmerian Version of the Scriptures. This is in the dialect spoken north of Lahore. An edition of the New Test. was printed in 1820, after having been ten years in course of preparation. In 1832 the Old Test. was completed for the press as far as the second book of Kings.

Casiāna was a deaconess, to whom Theodoret wrote his Epist. 17.

Casillac, BERNARD DE, a French prelate, was provost of Saint-Cécile of Albi and prior of Fargues, when he was elected by the chapter, Dec. 9, 1434, in place of Pierre Neveu; but pope Eugenius IV gave the bishopric to Robert Dauphin, bishop of Chartres. De Casillac applied to the Council of Basle, which recognised his election and consecrated him, Feb. 12, 1435, in the church of the Franciscan friars at Basle. Robert, on the other hand, received the appointment from the pope, and was confirmed by the king, and the two candidates then made haste to take possession of the bishopric by arms. Finally their case was brought before the parliament at Paris, which, by decree of April 1, 1460, sustained Bernard de Casillac. This prelate, however, died eighteen months afterwards, Nov. 11, 1462, leaving behind him only ruins as marks of his career. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casimir, patron saint of Poland, was grand-duke of Lithuania, and third son of Casimir IV, born Oct. 5, 1458, and was educated by John Dlugoff, a canon of Cracow, commonly called Longinus. Casimir, in early youth, devoted himself to piety and self-denial. When the nobles of Hungary, dissatisfied with Matthias Corvinus, their king, entreated the king of Poland to send his son Casimir to occupy the throne, the latter, with extreme reluctance, went thither; but finding that the differences between Matthias and his people were adjusted, he joyfully returned home, and spent the rest of his life in exercises of devotion. He died of consumption, at Wilna, in Lithuania, March 4, 1482. He was canonized by pope Leo X. The day of his commemoration is March 4. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casimir, a French Capuchin theologian, was born at Toulouse in 1634. He was made rector after 1666. Of his works there are extant, Histoire de Mlle. de Bachelier (Rouen, 1642, 1680, 12mo):—Atom. Philosophiæ Peripatet., etc. (Béziers, 1674, 8vo):—La Vie du P. Jean XI.—27

Baptiste d'Este (ibid. 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casina was martyred, together with her husband, Melasippus, and her son, Antony, at Ancyra, by order of Julian the Apostate. According to Menol. Basil., they are commemorated Nov. 7.

Casino, MONTE (or Monte-Cassino) is a celebrated abbey in Italy, founded by St. Benedict, and situated on a mountain immediately behind the city of Casino. It was here that St. Benedict established the order which bears the name of this place. The abbey of Monte-Casino was destroyed by the Lombards in 580, when St. Benedict, the abbot, and all his monks escaped to Rome, and were lodged near the Lateran church. About 720 they were restored, under the abbot Petronax. In 884 the house was again destroyed by the Saracens, in 1046 by the Normans, and by the emperor Frederick in 1239. The Chronicle of Monte-Casino, published in 1603, comprehends all the memorable facts connected with the monastery and church, from 542 to 1186. It is in four books, the three first written by Leo of Ostia, the fourth by Peter the Deacon. See MONTE-CASSINO.

Casiri, MICHAEL, a learned Maronite, was born in 1710 at Tripoli, in Syria. Being educated at Rome, in the college of St. Peter and St. Marcellinus, he entered the clerical order in 1734. In 1735 he accompanied Assemani into Syria, by order of the pope, to assist in a synod of the Maronites. Casiri made a report in 1738 at Rome on the religious opinions of that sect, after which he was appointed to teach in his convent Arabic, Syriac, and Chaldee, theology and philosophy. In 1748 he went to Madrid, and was employed there in the royal library, and in 1749 in the library of the Escorial, of which he was made director soon afterwards. He began in 1750 to collect the materials of the Bibliotheca Arabico-hispana, etc. (Madrid, 1760-70, 2 vols.). This famous work has a particular merit on account of its extracts from historical books in Arabic. The second volume, which treats of geographers and historians, is very interesting, and contains numerous documents concerning the wars between the Moors and Christians upon the Spanish peninsula. Casiri died at Madrid, March 12, 1791. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casia, PETRUS DE (Pierre Desmaison), a French ecclesiastic, was a native of Limoges, where he also joined the order of the Carmelites. In 1324 he was appointed provincial of Aquitania, and in 1330 general of his order. In 1341, Benedict XII made him bishop of Vaison, and in 1342 he was appointed by Clement VI patriarch of Jerusalem. He died Aug. 3, 1348. See Bibliotheca Carmelitana (Aurelianensis, 1752), ii, 561 sq.; Hundhausen, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Caskey, CURTIS, a Lutheran minister, was born at Canton, O., Oct. 17, 1827. His opportunities for securing an education were meagre. He was ordained in 1857 by the synod of northern Indiana, and for twenty-six years was actively engaged in the ministry. His last pastorate was what was then known as the Millersburg charge, in which he served more than five years. He died at his residence in Ligonier, Noble Co., Ind., Sept. 12, 1881. See Lutheran Observer, Oct. 7, 1881.

Casmann, OTTO, a German theologian and naturalist, was rector at the school of Stade, in Hanover, and afterwards pastor of the same town. He died Aug. 1, 1607. Of his works there are, Questionum Marinarum Libri ii (Frankfort, 1596, 1607, 2 vols. 8vo):—Nucleus Mysteriorum Naturæ Enucleatus (ibid. 1605, 8vo):—two editions of the treatise of De Re Cibaria of Bruyerin:—also some other works in German and Latin, on asceticism, of little value. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Casmillus (or Cadmillus) was the fourth of the Samothracian gods, or Cabiri. Wherever he went, the harmony of his voice, the eloquence of his speech, his graceful mien, and chaste conduct persuaded men to regular, discreet, and moral ways of living. He is thought to be the same as Mercury.

Casnedi, Carlo Antonio, an Italian Jesuit theologian, was born at Milan in the second half of the 17th century. After teaching philosophy and theology for some time in his native place, he visited the court of Madrid, and became examiner of the inquisition. He then went to Lisbon, where he became provincial of his order over Lusitania. He died in the first quarter of the 18th century, leaving Crisis Theologica in Selectiores Hujus et Elapsi Seculi Controversias (Lisbon, 1711). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casola, Pietro, an Italian theologian, was born at Milan. He became canon of the cathedral at Milan, and died there in 1507. His works are, Liber Litaniarum Triduanarum (Milan, 1494):—Rationale Cærimoniarum Missæ Ambrosianæ (ibid. 1498, 4to):—Cærimonie Missæ Ambrosianæ (ibid. 1499). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casolani, Alessandro, a reputable Italian historical painter, was born at Siena in 1552, studied under Cav. Roncalli, and died in 1606. His works are principally in the churches of Siena; there are also a number at Naples and Genoa. His best is The Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew, at the church of the Carmelites.

Casolani, Iario (or Cristoforo), an Italian painter, was born at Siena in 1588. He was a son of Alessandro, who instructed him in his art. He finished The Assumption, for the church of San Francesco at Sienna, sketched by his father before his death, and then went to Rome, and executed some fine work in the church of the Madonna de Mouli—The History of the Virgin, and an Ascension; The Trinity in Santa Maria, in Via. He died in 1661. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Casone, Giovanni Battista, an Italian painter, was a native of Sarzana, living in 1668; studied under Fiasella at Genoa. There is an altar-piece in Della Vigne, in that city, representing The Virgin Surrounded by Angels.

Caspar, Adolphus B., a minister of the Reformed Church, was born at Halberstadt, Germany, Nov. 2, 1810. His father, the Rev. Frederick W. H. Caspar, was court-preacher to William III, king of Prussia. The son was educated in his native country. In 1836 he emigrated to America, and entered the ministry in 1837. His first charge was Dillsburg, York Co., Pa. In 1840 he became pastor of several congregations in and around New Berlin, Union Co., Pa., where he died, June 5, 1882. For some years he was not able to preach, but made himself useful by practising medicine. He was a man of fine talents, high culture, and excellent social qualities, and was greatly respected in the community in which he lived. See Ref. Ch. Miss. July 5, 1882. (D. Y. H.)

Caspari, Christian Eduard, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who died as pastor in Alsace in 1878, is the author of Chronologisch-geographische Einleitung in das Leben Jesu Christi (Hamburg, 1869); translated into English by M. I. Evans, A Chronological and Geographical Introduction to the Life of Christ (Edinburgh, 1876). (B. P.)

Caspari, David, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 5, 1648, at Königsberg. Having completed his studies at various universities, he was in 1676 appointed sub-inspector of the Albertinian college at his native place; in 1678, rector of the cathedral school at Riga, where he died as superintendent, Feb. 28, 1702. He wrote, De Vita Dei, Qualis ea sit ex Monte Græcorum et Potissimum Aristotelis (Jena, 1673):—De Questione an Virtus Cadat in Deum (Königsberg, 1677):—De Futuri Theologi Studiis Philologicis et Phi- losophicis (edited by his son, 1705):—Breviarium Theologiæ Moralis (also edited by his son, 1712). See Gadebusch, Liefständische Bibliothek; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Caspari, Georg, son of the preceding, was born at Riga, April 17, 1683. He studied at Rostock, and died at his native place, April 12, 1743. He published, De Descensu Christi ad Inferos (Rostock, 1704):—De Testamentis Divinis (ibid. 1705); and other works. See Gadebusch, Liefständische Bibliothek; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Caspensis, Ludovicus, a Spanish Capuchin, was born at Saragossa, and joined his order when sixteen years of age. He was provincial of Aragon, and died in 1647. He wrote, Cursus Integer Theologicus (Lugduni, 1642, 1643, 2 vols.; enlarged edition, Lyons, 1666):—Cursus Integer Philosophicus (2 vols.):—Apologia in Defensionem Annalium Zachariæ Boverii (Cæsarugustæ, 1645). See Jeiler, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Caspers, Andreas, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 19, 1819, at Schleswig. He studied at Kiel; was in 1849 deacon at St. John's, in Flensburg; in 1851, pastor primarius and provost at Husum; and died April 9, 1879. He wrote, Das Symbolum Apostolicum mein Beichtbüchlein (Stuttgart, 1857):—Isaïa's Gedanken aus der Schrift (ibid. 1858):—Christi Fussstapfen (Leipzig, 1861-63; Engl. transl. The Footsteps of Christ, by A. G. Rodham, Edinburgh, 1871):—Praktische Auslegung der evangelischen Pericopen (1872):—Praktische Auslegung der epistolischen Pericopen (1875). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 217. (B. P.)

Caspi, Joseph. See IBN-CASPI.

Cass, William D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Bradford, Vt., April 2, 1797. He was converted at thirteen, but grew lukewarm; was reclaimed several years later by the Free-will Baptists, and was an ordained minister in that body several years. In 1827 he united with the New Hampshire Conference, and served the Church faithfully until 1866, when he retired to farm life near Sanborton Bridge, and there remained till his death, May 7, 1867. Untiring energy, flaming zeal, and an indomitable will made Mr. Cass one of the greatest powers of his conference. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 91.

Cassady, Francis Stansbury, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Baltimore, Md., Feb. 5, 1827. He was converted in 1846, and in 1850 entered the Baltimore Conference; continued his labors until March, 1872, and then became superannuated, which relation he sustained until his death, in his native city, Nov. 22, 1872. Mr. Cassady possessed superior powers of mind, which, by careful discipline, made him distinguished for comprehensiveness and clearness of thought, originality, and ability. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 30.

Cassady, Thomas S., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Montgomery, Va., in 1817. He was converted in his twentieth year; three years later received license to preach, and in 1843 entered the North Carolina Conference, and labored faithfully until his decease, Dec. 11, 1849. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1850, p. 292.

Cassan (Caissin, Cassidanus, Cassidus) was, according to Colgan, a common name among the saints of Ireland; he mentions four, who are also given in Mart. Doneg. and Tallaght, but whom he cannot distinguish with any historical accuracy.

1. There is entered in the Annals of the Four Masters, "A.D. 695, Caissin, scribe of Lusca, died." He was son of Athracht, of the race of Laeghaire, son of Niall, and the monastery where he was scribe or chronicler was Lusk or Lush, now a parish in the barony of E. Balrothery, County Dublin.

2. Son of Neman. Mart. Doneg. calls him "Caisin of the Dal Buain, who is of the race of Eochaidh, son of Muiredh, of the posterity of Heremon." He flourished about A.D. 530, and was a contemporary of St. Finnian of Clonard. He is commemorated March 1.

3. Of Jomdual and Domnach-mor, in Magh-Echnach. About the middle of the 5th century, when St. Patrick began to preach in Ireland, St. Cassan lived in Meath. He is said to have gone on a pilgrimage to Rome, and on his return became "Abbas, episcopus, et scholæ publicæ rector." St. Patrick afterwards gave him the church of Domnach-mor in Magh-Echnach, and also a holy patena; at this ancient church of Donaghmore, in the barony of Lower Naran, his relics were preserved and held in the highest veneration for ages after his death. Colgan says he flourished about A.D. 456, but Ceranus or Ciaran of Saighir, a fellow-traveller to Rome, is usually placed in the following century. He is commemorated March 28.

4. Of Domnach-Peduir. This Cassan of Peter's Church is probably son of Maenach, and brother of St. Fachtna of Ross. He may also be Cassidus or Cassidanus, "institutor" of St. Senan at Iniscathehy. He was born in the region of Kierraighe Chuirke (probably a part of Kerry), and dwelt in the monastery of Irras, where he gave the monastic robe and tonsure to St. Senan. To this monastery, the scene of his early training, and the resting-place of his master, St. Senan was coming when he felt his own end approaching, but died on his way thither. He is commemorated June 17.

We find mention, also, of Cassan Cluain-ratha, June 20. At Dec. 3, there is a Cassan, where Dr. Reeves (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 325) cites an authority for identifying him with the martyr Cassan in Mauritania, commemorated in the Roman Martyrology.

Cassan, STEPHEN HYDE, an English clergyman, was born in 1789. He was presented to the living of Bruton, in 1831, and died in 1841. He published, Lives and Memoirs of the Bishops of Sherborne and Salisbury, 705-1824 (Salisbury, 1824):—Lives of the Bishops of Winchester, from Birinus to the Present Time (Lond. 1827, 2 vols. 8vo):—Lives of the Bishops of Bath and Wells, etc. (1829):—Considerations Respecting the Corporation and Test Acts (1828). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cassana, Giovanni Francesco, an Italian painter, was born at Genoa in 1611, and studied under Strozzi. He passed some time at the archduke's court in Mirandola, where he painted a picture of St. Girolamo, in the dome of the church, besides other creditable pictures. He died in 1691. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cassana, Maria Vittoria, an Italian female artist, sister of the preceding, painted small pictures of devout subjects for private collections, which were much esteemed. She died at Venice in 1711. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cassanate, MARCOS ANTONIO ALEGRE, a Spanish Carmelite, was born in 1590 at Tarragona, and died in 1658, leaving nine volumes of sermons and other writings, among which are Paradisi Carmeliticæ Decoris, etc. (Lyons, 1639, fol.). This work, which is a sort of library of famous Carmelites, was censured by the Sorbonne. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cassandra, in Greek legend, was the most unfortunate of all the daughters of Priam and Hecuba. Apollo loved her, and promised, if she would favor him, he would teach her to look into the future. She promised, but, after having been gifted by the god, she did not keep her word. Therefore he deprived her of the faith of the people, and caused her to be a mockery among men. She was now thought insane, and, as she prophesied nothing but evil, she was imprisoned in a tower. Later she became a priestess of Minerva, out of whose temple Ajax, son of Oileus, dragged her by the hair, when she had accidentally thrown down the statue of the goddess. At the conquest of the city she was given to Agamemnon, who took her with him on his ships, and by her became father of the twin sons Teledamus and Pelops. When the king returned to his country he was murdered, with Cassandra. Her two sons also were slaughtered by the revengeful Clytemnestra on the grave of Agamemnon. Pausanias relates that in the ruins of Mycenæ there might be seen the grave of Agamemnon, of Cassandra, and of the two sons. She had a temple at Leuctra and a statue by the name of Alexandra.

Cassani, JOSÉ, a Spanish Jesuit hagiographer, who lived in the first part of the 18th century, wrote, Vida Virtudes y Milagros de San Stanislas Kostka (Madrid, 1715, 8vo):—Vida, Virtudes y Milagros de San Luis Gonzaga (ibid. 1726, 8vo):—Historia de Provincia de Compagni de Jesus del Nuevo Regno de Granada (ibid. 1741, fol.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cassel, JOHANN PHILIP, a German writer, professor of elocution and librarian of the reformed gymnasium at Bremen, where he was born Oct. 31, 1707, and died July 17, 1783, is the author of Templo Oniz Heliopolitano (Bremen, 1730):—De Locis in Usum Sacrum Destinatio (Magdeburg, 1731):—Diss. περί των λίσων εκκραζομένων, ad Luc. xix, 40 (ibid. 1737):—Judeorum Odio et Abatinentia a Porcina (ibid. 1739):—De Gloria Jesu Christi in Regno Gratiae (ibid. 1743-46):—Nachrichten von der Kirche des heil. Willebald in Bremen (Bremen, 1775). See Meusel, Gelehrtes Deutschland; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 545; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Cassels, JOHN BAKER, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Liberty County, Ga., April 6, 1811. He spent part of a year in Princeton Seminary, N. J.; was also a student in Columbia Seminary; was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Hopewell, April 22, 1837; was pastor at Salem Church, Ga., during 1837 and 1838, and died in Wilkes County, July 24, 1838. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 81.

Cassentino, JACOPO DI, an Italian painter, was born about 1270, and studied under Taddeo Gaddi. He founded the Florentine Academy in 1350. His most memorable work was St. Luke Painting the Portrait of the Virgin, painted for the chapel of the academy. He died in 1356. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Cassian, Saint. See CASSIANUS.

Cassiani, Padre STEFANO (called il Certosino), an Italian painter, lived at Lucca about 1660. He painted in fresco the cupola of the church of the Carthusians at Lucca, also two altar-pieces, representing subjects from the life of the Virgin, and several works for other churches of that order in Pisa, Siena, and elsewhere.

Cassianus is the name of several persons in early Christian records:

1. The second Gentile bishop of Jerusalem (Eusebius, H. E. v. 12).

2. JULIUS. See CASSAN, JULIUS.

3. A Christian schoolmaster, and apparently a short-hand teacher at Imola (Forum Corneli), in Romagna, who, on refusing to sacrifice, was given up to the boys of his school to kill with their styles and tablets. His martyrdom is assigned to Aug. 11 or 13, on which latter day it has been celebrated since the 8th century. He is said to be buried under the altar of the cathedral at Imola, which is dedicated to him (Tillemont, v. 53). The martyrdom is thought to have occurred in the time of Decius (249-251).

4. A martyr at Tangiers, commemorated Dec. 5

(Mart. Usuardi). He is said to have been clerk of the prætorium at Tangiers, when the magistrate Aurelius Agricola condemned to death St. Marcellus the centurion, at which Cassianus became so indignant that he threw both pen and paper to the ground. He was put into prison and beheaded in 298; according to the Jerusalem Martyrology, Dec. 3.

5. One of those martyred with Saturninus and Daturus, under Diocletian, in 305.

6. One of the eighteen martyrs of Saragossa; being one of the four whom Prudentius calls Saturninus. He is commemorated, according to Usuard's Mart., April 16.

7. A deacon of Rome, sent by pope Melchtiades (Miltiades) to receive back the confiscated catacombs at the close of the persecution (A.D. 313), and identified by the Donatists with a Cassianus who had been a traditor; an identification which Augustine (Post. Coll. ad Don. ix, 662) indignantly repudiates.

8. One of the Donatist bishops who petitioned Julian (A.D. 362) to be recalled from exile and restored to the possession of their basilicas. They spoke of justice as the only plea that had any weight with the apostate.

9. Bishop of Autun, was born of noble parents in Alexandria, and brought up by bishop Zonis; he made his house a Christian hospital in the time of Julian, liberated his slaves, and built a church to St. Lawrence, at Orta in Egypt, at which place he was made bishop against his will, in the time of Jovian, A.D. 363. He afterwards went to Autun, where he helped in the conversion of the pagans, and would have proceeded to Britain, but Simplicius detained him. Simplicius dying three years later, he was unanimously appointed his successor. He held the see for twenty years. He is commemorated, according to Usuard's Mart., Aug. 5.

10. A presbyter who took part in the Council of Aquileia, A.D. 381.

11. Of Rome, A.D. 431, commemorated Feb. 29 (Cal. Byzant.); perhaps identical with one of the above.

Cassidānus (or Cassīdus). See CASSAN.

Cassiday, DAVID, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Vermilion County, Ill., June 6, 1826. He was converted when about fourteen; received license to preach in 1846, and admitted into the Illinois Conference; located in 1850, and began business to provide for the education of his children; re-entered the effective ranks in 1852, and continued faithful until his death in April, 1862. Mr. Cassiday was sound in theology, practical in preaching, and earnest in his Christian life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 177.

Cassie, JOHN, A.M., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Peterhead, near Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1807. He studied theology at Glasgow, was ordained in 1834, and installed pastor of a congregation at Port Hope, Canada West, in 1835. He died June 19, 1861. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 316.

Cassin, EUGÈNE, a French philanthropist, was born in Sens, Dec. 11, 1796. Having distinguished himself by his devotion to the sick in the hospital of Sens, which he entered as an employée, he went to Paris and became one of the most active agents of all the societies of instruction and associations of charity. He died Feb. 14, 1844, leaving L'Almanach Philanthropique (Paris, 1826, 1827):—Choix de Nouveaux Fac-simile d'Écrivains Contemporains et de Personages Célèbres (ibid. 1833). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cassino, BARTOLOMEO DI, an Italian painter, was a native of Milan, and studied under Civerchio. There are works by him at Milan, particularly an altar-piece in the Immacolata, dated 1513.

Cassito, LUIGI VICENTE, an Italian theologian and antiquarian, was born at Bonito in 1765. He entered the order of Dominicans, became prior at the great convent of Naples, and died March 1, 1822. His principal works are, Institutiones Theologicæ (4 vols. 8vo):—Liturgia Dominicana (2 vols. 8vo):—Atti Sinceri del Martire di Cuma, S. Massimo:—also Discourses and Funeral Orations. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cassius is the name of several men in early Christian records or legends:

1. Bishop of Tyre, who in the year 198 attended the synod held at Cæsarea, under the presidency of Theophilus, bishop of that city, and Narcissus, of Jerusalem, to settle the paschal controversy (Euseb. H. E. v. 25).

2. Saint, of Auvergne, about the time of Crocus, king of the Alemanni (probably A.D. 260), was found by Victorinus, the officer of the pagan priest, in a village called the village of the Christians. Victorinus is said to have been so touched by his preaching and miracles that he became a Christian and a miracle-worker himself, and the two were martyred together, May 15. See Acta Sanctorum, May, iii, 454.

3. Numidian bishop addressed in Cyprian, Epist. 70, and speaks twenty-second in Sentt. Epp. Syn. Carth. as bishop of Macomades, near Cirta.

4. A jailer at Byzantium, who kept Acacius in custody in A.D. 306, and testified that he had heard from the fellow-prisoners, and seen with his own eyes, that many splendid soldiers, advocates, and physicians attended on him in his cell, but disappeared immediately when the door was unlocked. He was flogged for the assertion, but persisted in it, and offered to die for it, according to Simeon Metaphrastes.

5. Martyr at Bonn, Oct. 10, along with St. Gergon, according to Usuard's Mart.

6. Bishop of Narni, said to have freed the sword-bearer of Totila from a devil by signing him with the cross. He is commemorated on June 29.

Cassius, BARTHOLOMÆUS, a Dalmatian theologian and grammarian, of the Jesuit order, was born in 1575. After having been missionary in the Levant, he became successively provincial at Ragusa and apostolic penitentiary at Rome. He died Sept. 28, 1650, leaving Institutiones Lingue Illyricæ (Rome, 1604, 8vo). Cassius also wrote, Spiritual Songs, in the Dalmatian language (1624, 8vo):—translations of the Roman Ritual (1640, 4to), and of the Missal (1641, fol.). His other works, which are in Latin, are ascetic, and of no interest. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Casson, HODGSON, an English Wesleyan minister, famous for his zeal, eccentricity, and success, was born at Workington, Cumberland, in 1788. He was converted under the Methodist ministry, applied himself to study, became a local preacher—preaching and being persecuted everywhere—and was received by the Conference in 1815. His circuits were principally in the north of England and in Scotland. After a ministry of remarkable earnestness, he reluctantly retired from the active service in 1838, residing in Berstal and died Nov. 23, 1851. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1852, p. 11; West, Sketches of Wesleyan Preachers, p. 187 sq. (Lond. ed.); Stevens, Hist. of Methodism, iii, 294-304; Steele, Life and Labors of Hodgson Casson (Lond. 1854).

Cast, CHARLES, a minister of the Reformed Church, was born in Ettlingen, Germany, Feb. 22, 1815. He studied in the universities of Freiburg and Heidelberg, completing his theological course at Freiburg. He was ordained as a Roman Catholic priest in 1845, having been called to Carlsruhe, the capital of Baden, where he attracted considerable attention as a pulpit orator. He came to America in 1850, renounced Romanism, and, in 1852, was received by the Synod of the Reformed Church at Baltimore, Md. He labored successively in the East and West, and finally settled in Egg Harbor, N. J., where he died Jan. 2, 1883. Mr. Cast was a man of good natural endowments and thorough scholarship, an able and eloquent pulpit orator, and successful pastor. (D. Y. H.)

Castagnares, AGOSTINHO, a Roman Catholic missionary, was born Sept. 25, 1687, at Palta, in Paraguay. He was educated by the Jesuits, and entered their society when a youth. It was intended by his superiors that he should preach the faith to the savages, and being placed among the Chiquitas and Guaranis, he succeeded in converting a part of the Samuques tribe. He then went to the Mataguais, among whom he had already made some converts, when he was killed by the cacique of the tribe, Sept. 15, 1744. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castagniza (or Castaniza), JUAN DE, a Spanish biographer and theologian, of the order of Benedictines, who died at Salamanca in 1598, was general preacher of his order, chaplain of Philip II, and censor of theology of the apostolic judges of faith. His principal works are, La Vida de Santo Benito (Salamanca, 1583, 8vo):—Historia de Santo Romualdo Padre y Fundador del Ordene Camaldulense (1597, 4to). Some biographers attribute to him a well-known book, Batalla Spiritual, but it is known now that the monk Laurent Scupoli wrote it. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castagno, ANDREA DEL, a distinguished Italian painter, was born in Tuscany in 1409, and was placed under Masaccio for instruction while quite young. The best of his works are at Florence, in the Hall of Justice, and in the Church of Santa Lucia; also on a wall in the monastery Degli Angeli. He died in 1480. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castalia, in Greek mythology, was a nymph, the daughter of the river-god Achelous, who lived near Delphi, and from whom the Castalian spring has its name. She is said to have been very beautiful, and loved by Apollo, and to escape his attentions she threw herself into the spring. Thereupon the god selected this place as his favorite spot, ordered a temple to be built, and endowed the spring with animating virtues, so that whoever drank from it would become a poet. From this spring, as also from the spring Cassotis, the Pythian prophetess drank before she took the tripod.

Castalius was bishop at the Council of Sinuessa, A.D. 303.

Castanet. See CYMBAL.

Castanet, BERNARD DE, a French prelate, was born at Montpelier of an ancient family from Rouergue. He was auditor of the papal palace under Innocent V, when called to replace Bernard of Cambrez in the see of Albi, March 7, 1276. He immediately built a new cathedral, the magnificent church of St. Cécile. He laid the foundations of a convent for the Dominicans, and another for the Minorite Franciscans. Being appointed by Philip the Fair to treat with Boniface VIII about the canonization of St. Louis, he displayed great prudence, and secured the secularization of his own chapter. The severity of the bishop in his functions, however, excited the indignation of the people, of the consuls, and even of the clergy, who brought their complaints before the court of Rome. In 1308 the pope made inquiries, in consequence of which Bernard of Castanet was transferred to the bishopric of Puy. Eight years afterwards John XXII assigned the bishopric of Paris and the cardinal's hat to Castanet. The latter died Aug. 14, 1317, at Avignon. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castaneus, HENRI LOUIS, bishop of Poitiers, was born Sept. 6, 1577, at Tivoli, and died July 30, 1651. He wrote, Commentarius in Genesis:—Commentarius in Evangel. Matthæi et Acta Apostolorum:—Synopsis Distinctionum Theologicarum et Philosophicarum (edited, with annotations, by Sam. Maresius, 1658):—Nomen- clator Illustrium Cardinalium, etc. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 693. (B. P.)

Castberg, PETER ATKE, founder of the institution for deaf mutes at Copenhagen, was born in Norway in 1780. After having passed through his medical studies at Copenhagen, he travelled through Germany, France, and Italy to study methods of instruction for the deaf and dumb. On his return in 1805 he became professor, and in 1807 director, of the institution. He died in 1827, leaving, among other scientific dissertations, Farelsøninger over Døvstumme-Undervæsenings Methode (Copenhagen, 1818):—Sententiæ de Inspiratione Prima (ibid. 1823):—Carl Michael de l'Épée, et Biographisk Forsøg (ibid. 1806), etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castelaw (or Castellaw), THOMAS, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1663; was sent to preach in the presbytery of Dunfermline in 1691; was a member of the General Assembly in 1692; and died after Dec. 1, 1703. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 763.

Castelaw, WILLIAM (1), a Scotch clergyman, studied at the University of Glasgow, and was appointed to the living at Stewarton in 1618. Between 1625 and 1630 there was a great religious awakening in the parish, known then as the "Stewart on sickness." He died in July, 1642. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 188.

Castelaw, WILLIAM (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Glasgow University in 1632; was admitted to the living at Stewarton in 1635; not conforming to episcopacy, was confined to his parish in 1662; was excused by the privy council in 1672, and died before March 1, 1699. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 188, 189.

Castelfranco, ORAZIO DA, an excellent Italian fresco painter, flourished in the time of Titian, but very little is known of him. In the church of the Dominicans, at Campo d'Istria, is a large picture, executed in the glowing style of Titian, signed "Horatio: Per. P. A.D. MDLXVIII," attributed to him. He was living in 1600.

Castellesi, ADRIANO, an Italian prelate, was born at Corneto (Tuscany), in the latter part of the 15th century. Although of obscure parentage, he attained to the first dignities of the Church. Having been sent to England by Innocent VIII, he gained by that mission the favor of Henry VII, who in 1503 appointed him bishop of Hereford, and in the year following transferred him to the see of Bath and Wells. Meanwhile pope Alexander VI made him his secretary and gave him the cardinal's hat. It is said that this pontiff, in trying to poison him, poisoned himself. Castellesi was exiled by Julius II, and called back again by Leo X; but he entered into a conspiracy against the latter pope, and was condemned to pay a certain sum; he then fled from Rome, but it has never been ascertained precisely what became of him. He left, De Vera Philosophia (Bologna, 1507):—De Sermone Latino (Basle, 1513):—De Narratione, et Julii III, ster (Venice, 1534). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castelli, ANNIBALE, a Bolognese painter, flourished about 1605, and studied under Faceine. His best work is The Raising of Lazarus, in the Church of San Paolo, at Bologna.

Castelli (or Castello), BERNARDO, an Italian painter, was born at Genoa in 1557, and studied under A. Semini. He painted a number of pictures for the Genoese churches, the principal of which are St. Diego and St. Jerome, in San Francesco. At Rome he painted Peter Walking on the Sea, in the Basilica of St. Peter's. He died in 1629. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castelli (or Castello), FABRIZIO, a talented Italian painter, the son of Giovanni Battista, was employed by Philip II on the Escorial, in connection with other artists. He also painted several frescos at the Prado, and he colored forty-eight busts of saints, executed by Juan of Arfe for the Escorial. He died at Madrid in 1617.

Castelli (or Castello), Giovanni Battista (called il Bergamasco), an eminent Italian painter, was born in the year 1490, and studied under Aurelio Busso, at Crema. Soon after leaving this master he went to Rome for improvement. On returning to Genoa he painted for the Church of San Marcelino. In the monastery of San Sebastiano is his celebrated picture of the martyrdom of that saint, which gained him high reputation. He died at Madrid in 1570.

Castelli (or Castello), Valerio, an Italian painter, the son of Bernardo, was born at Genoa in 1625, and was the scholar of Fiasella. He painted a number of frescos for the Genoese churches, which nearly approached the excellence of Carloni, as is evident in the cupola of the Nunziata, and in Santa Marta. Some of his other works are, The Annunciation; The Marriage of the Virgin; The Presentation in the Temple; The Crowning of the Virgin, with a choir of angels. Castelli died in 1659. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castellini, Luca, an Italian canon and theologian, of the order of the Dominicans, was born at Faenza. After having been vicar-general of his order, he became, in 1629, bishop of Catanzaro, and died in 1631. His principal writings are, De Electione et Confirmatione Canonica Prælatorum (Rome, 1625); — De Canonisatione Sanctorum (ibid. 1629). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castello, Avanzino di, an Italian painter, was born in the Roman States in 1552, and studied under Pomerancio at Rome, where he painted many pictures for the churches. The best of his works are, The Miracle of the Viper, in the Isle of Malta; The Decoliation of St. Paul, and Paul's Ascent into the Third Heaven, in the Church of San Paolo, near Rome. Castello died in 1629.

Castello, Castellino, an eminent painter of Turin, was born in 1579, and studied under Gio. Battista Paggi. His picture of The Pentecost, in the Church of Spirito Santo, gained him much reputation. He died in 1649.

Castello, Francesco da, an Italian painter, was born in Flanders, of Spanish parents, in 1586. He visited Rome while young, for improvement, and painted historical and sacred subjects. Among his work for the churches is an altar-piece in San Giacomo degli Spagnuoli, representing The Assumption, with a glory of angels, and the apostles below. In San Rocco di Ripetta is a picture by him of The Madonna and Child, with saints. He died at Rome in 1636.

Castellucci, SALVI, an Italian painter, was born at Arezzo in the year 1608, and studied at Rome under Pietro da Cortona. There are several of his larger works in the churches of his native city. He died in 1672.

Castelnau, PIERRE DE, a French Cistercian at the convent of Fontfroide, near Narbonne, was commissioned as legate by Innocent III. with two other monks of his order, Raoul and Arnaud, to combat with fire and sword the progress of the Albigenses. Castelnau showed great determination, but did not succeed in his purpose. Finally, having rebuked Raymond VI for his weak faith, he fled from court, but was overtaken near the Rhone and slain, Jan. 15, 1208. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castiglione, Carlo Ottavio, Count, a reputable Italian philologist, was born at Milan in 1784. His principal work was in connection with the Arabic and other languages. He died at Genoa, April 10, 1849. In 1819 he published Monete Cypiche del Museo di Milano, and assisted cardinal Mai in his Uphila Partium Ineditarum in Ambrosianis Palimpsestis Repertarum Editio. A learned Mémoire Géographique et Numismatique sur la Partie Orientale de la Barbarie Appelée Afrikia par les Arabes, appeared in 1826, and established Castiglione's reputation. In 1829 he published the Gothic version of the second epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, and this was followed by the Gothic version of the epistle to the Romans, the first epistle to the Corinthians, and the epistle to the Ephesians in 1834; by Galatians, Philipians, and first Thessalonians in 1835, and by second Thessalonians in 1839. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.

Castiglione, Giovanni Benedetto (called il Grechetto), an eminent Italian painter and engraver, was born at Genoa in 1616, and studied for some time under Giovanni Andrea Ferrari. He afterwards visited Rome, Florence, Parma, and Venice, in each of which cities he left proofs of his ability. His Nativity, in the the Church of San Luca at Genoa, and his Magdalen and St. Catherine, in the Madonna di Castello, are fine works of art. He died at Mantua in 1670. Some of his engravings are: Noah Driving the Animals into the Ark; The Departure of Jacob; Rachel Hiding her Father's Images; The Adoration of the Shepherds; The Angel Appearing to Joseph in his Dream; The Flight into Egypt; The Finding of the Bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castiglione, Giuseppe, an Italian artist and missionary, was born in 1698. He joined the order of Jesuits, and was sent as a missionary to Pekin, where Kien-Long erected several palaces from designs furnished by him. He frequently exerted his influence to protect Christians from persecution. He died at Pekin in 1768. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Castiglione, Lupus de, an Italian canon of the order of Benedictines, a native of Florence, lived in the first part of the 14th century. He was prior of Saint-Miniat, and author of Allegaciones, a commentary on the Clementines; also additions to Petrucci's De Pluralitate Beneficiorum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castillo (or Castillejo), Antonio del, a Spanish traveller, of the Franciscan order, visited Alexandria, Rosetta, Cairo, and Judea. He died at Madrid in 1669, leaving Viage de Tierra Santa (Madrid, 1654). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castillo, Augustin del, a Spanish painter, was born at Seville in 1565, and studied under Luis Fernandez. He resided chiefly at Cordova, where he painted a number of pictures for the churches. There is an Annunciation by him, in the Church of Nuestra Señora de los Liberos; several pictures in the convent of San Pablo; and an Adoration of the Magi, in the cathedral at Cadiz, which is said to be his finest work. He died at Cordova in 1626. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castillo, Fernand del, a Spanish historian of the Dominican order, was born in Granada about 1529. He was preacher at the court, preceptor of the infant Ferdinand, and professor of theology in different houses of his order. He died March 29, 1593. His principal work was Historia General de Santo Domingo (Madrid and Valladolid, 1584, 1592, 2 vols.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castillo y Saavedra, ANTONIO DEL, an eminent Spanish painter, was born at Cordova in 1603, and was the son of Augustin Castillo, who gave him his earliest instruction. He afterwards became a scholar of Francisco Zurbaran. Castillo painted many pictures of great merit for the cathedral of Cordova, the best of which are St. Peter and St. Paul, and The Assumption. There is a picture by him in the convent of St. Francis at Cordova, representing a subject from the life of that saint. His death occurred in 1667. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castillon, ANTOINE, a French Jesuit preacher, lived in the 17th century, and wrote, L'Institution du Saint Sacrement (Paris, 1669, 8vo):—Sermons pour L'Arent (ibid. 1672, 8vo):—Panegyriques des Saints (1676, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castinus of Tivoli was father of pope Simplicius. It is uncertain whether this was the same as the Castinus who was general under Honorius in 422, and banished by Placidia in 425.

Castle, Allen, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Alburt, Vt., Nov. 2, 1805. He joined the Church when about eighteen; labored some time as exhorter; received license to preach in 1833, and in 1836 united with the Black River Conference, in whose active ranks he labored until his death, Oct. 21, 1865. He was an earnest, devoted Christian minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 101.

Castle, Henry, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Bristol, March 19, 1814. He was received into the ministry in 1835, and died Aug. 24, 1878. He was noted for his uniform gentleness and geniality, as well as punctuality. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1879, p. 14.

Castle, Joseph, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Devonshire, England, Jan. 6, 1801. He came to America at the age of ten, was converted, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church at nineteen. Being soon after licensed to preach, he joined the Genesee Conference on trial, in which he served five charges. At its division, in 1829, he became a member of the Oneida Conference, and in this filled five pastorates and one term as presiding elder. In 1839 he was transferred to the Troy Conference, and after filling one appointment two years, was transferred to the Philadelphia Conference, where he spent the remainder of his life. After fifty-two years of effective service, he received a superannuated relation in 1875. He was a delegate to seven General Conferences. He died Feb. 1, 1881. Of imposing presence, fine powers of elocution, possessing great command of language and a mind of extensive resources, he was a preacher of unusual power, a theologian and scholar of great attainments. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 74.

Castleden, James, an English Baptist minister, was born at Faversham, Kent, Feb. 25, 1778, and was reared in the Church of England. At seventeen he was converted in a Wesleyan prayer-meeting, and on the next Sunday preached a sermon. He was baptized by Dr. Jenkins in 1799, became a deacon, for nine years preaching occasionally at Holly Bush Hill, London. A chapel was built for him, and was pastor at Hampstead for thirty-six years. In 1853 he was seized with paralysis, and died June 4, 1854. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1855, p. 46.

Castleden, Michael, an English Congregational minister, was born in London, Feb. 22, 1769. He entered Hoxton Academy in 1792, and was ordained at Aylesbury in the summer of 1797. Discouraged in this field by the prevalence of Antinomianism, he removed to Woburn, Bedfordshire, and there commenced his pastorate, Nov. 5, 1800, remaining until 1840, when, because of feebleness, he resigned. An annuity was secured to him through the liberality of his friends, and he continued to preach, when able, until his death, Nov. 5, 1848. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1848, p. 215.

Castleford, THOMAS, a monk and writer of the 14th century, a native of Yorkshire, was educated at a Benedictine at Pontefract, of which he wrote a history (1326). See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 426.

Castleman, David, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Gettysburg, Pa., Nov. 4, 1825. He was converted in his youth; received license to preach in 1848; and in the following year was admitted into the Baltimore Conference, in which he labored until his sudden death, Nov. 10, 1875. Mr. Castleman was a careful student, an approved preacher, an industrious, faithful, affectionate, efficient pastor, and a devout Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 39; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Castleman, Robert, an Episcopal clergyman of Petersburg, Va., was murdered near Gaston, N. C., for his efforts in behalf of the freedmen, Oct. 11, 1865. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1865, p. 651.

Castleman, Thomas G., a missionary of the Protestant Episcopal Church, labored as such throughout the country with indomitable zeal. His first charge was Staunton, Va., where he labored for fourteen years, building a beautiful church, and establishing the Virginia Female Institute. During two years he was engaged in teaching in the diocese of Illinois, but his last days were spent in labor at and about St. Joseph, La., where he died, Feb. 7, 1861. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1861, p. 188.

Castles, ALLEN, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Montgomery County, N. C., Nov. 12, 1821. He removed with his parents to Choctaw County, Miss., when about twelve years of age; embraced religion in 1842; and in 1848 received license to preach, and entered the Mississippi Conference. He died Sept. 28, 1861. From youth Mr. Castles's life was blameless. He was a man of limited education but great application, full of zeal and the Holy Spirit. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1861, p. 320.

Castor is the name of several persons in early Christian records:

1. A correspondent and personal friend of Gregory Nazianzen. There are two letters of Gregory to Castor: one (Epist. 93) sent by his young friend and spiritual son Sacerdos, whom Gregory begs he will not detain long. The second (Epist. 94) contains complaints of his own health, and threatens Castor in playful terms if he does not soon send back a lady whom he calls "their common sister."

2. A presbyter of Treves under St. Maximinus, who became a hermit at Caerden, and died Feb. 13 (Acta Sanctorum).

3. A confessor and bishop of Apt, in Provence, who appears to have been born at Nismes, and to have founded a monastery between the years 419-426. He is commemorated Sept. 21 (Acta Sanctorum, Sept. vi, 249). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

4. A priest of Coblenz, who is said to have performed many miracles, but his history is uncertain, and his date is unknown (Acta Sanctorum, Feb. ii, 663).

5. The father of pope Felix IV.

Castorina was the maternal aunt of St. Jerome. His letter to her (13, ed. Vall.), written when he was in the desert, shows that there had been some disagreement between them.

Castorius is the name of several early Christians:

1. The brother of the constable Nicostratus, converted and martyred with him (see Tillemont, Mémoires, iv, 521, 528). His feast is marked July 7, but Tillemont observes that they could not have suffered before the 17th. Claudius, the jailer, and his sons, Felix and Felicitissimus, were also converted and martyred along with them, A.D. 286.

2. A martyr at Nicomedia, commemorated March 16.

3. A martyr at Tarsus, commemorated March 28.

4. The name of three Roman presbyters in A.D. 303, one condemned, with Marcellinus, for apostasy, and also for betraying the granaries of the Church, the other two accusing him (Labbe, Concil. i, 939-943).

5. The brother of Maximian (q. v.). We meet with him in the year 402 (Tillemont, xiii, 388; Labbe, Concil. ii, 1101). The brothers were Donatists, and became Catholics. Maximian was appointed to the see of Vagina, but a scandal was raised against him, and he withdrew. Castorius was urged to take his brother's place by Augustine and Alypius (Epist. 69, vol. ii, p. 230), whom Tillemont (Mémoires, xiii, 991) supposes to have been then at Vagina, where Castorius had been elected, and whence he retired.

6. The notary and representative or nuntio of pope Gregory I at Ravenna, against whom the people of that town laid complaints (Gregory, Epist. vi, 31).

7. Bishop of Rimini, ordained reluctantly by Gregory I, at the request of the people, but resigned because of infirmity (Gregory, Epist. ii, 35).

8. A deacon, charged with examining into the life of the bishop of Pesaro and his presbyters (Gregory, Epist. viii, 19).

Castrejon, ANTONIO, a Spanish painter, was born at Madrid in 1625, and was celebrated for his small historical subjects, although he painted several larger works for the churches, which possess great merit. The best of these is St. Michael Subduing the Dragon. In St. Giles is his Presentation in the Temple, and several subjects from the life of the Virgin. He died at Madrid in 1690. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castrensis, Saint, was celebrated in South Italy as an African bishop of note, who, in some barbarian persecution, both of clergy and laity (perhaps between 496 and 522) was taken with eleven other bishops and put on board an old ship, which carried them to Sinuessa, or Volturno, where he died, Feb. 11 (Tillemont, xvi, 607, 608). It seems more probable that the name is only the title taken from his see, and that he may be the Candidianus, bishop of Castra, in Mauritania Caesariensis, who is given in a list of bishops persecuted by Huneric (A.D. 484). His legend is given from two MSS. in the Acta Sanctorum, Feb. ii, 523.

Castrocchia was a rich and fashionable matron of Constantinople, the widow of Saturninus (consul in A.D. 383), a leading member of the female cabal formed against Chrysostom at the court of the empress Eudoxia.

Castries, ARMAND PIERRE de la Croix de, a French prelate, was born in 1659, of an ancient and noble family of Languedoc. He was destined from his early childhood to the priesthood; received while still quite young the title of doctor of the Sorbonne, and was appointed in 1697 to the abbey of Val-Magne, in the diocese of Agde. Five years later he received the abbey of Saint-Chaffre-le-Monestier, in the diocese of Puy. Shortly after he became chaplain to the duchess of Berry; in 1717 he was appointed archbishop of Tours; and, finally, transferred to the see of Albi, Nov. 5, 1719. He was called the good archbishop, and was very active in embellishing his church. He died April 15, 1746. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castro, Alfonso, a Portuguese Jesuit, was sent as a missionary to India, and was killed there in 1558, by the natives of the Moluccas, after a sojourn of eleven years. He left a full account of his mission (Rome, 1556). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castro, Alfonso de, a Spanish theologian and Franciscan, was born at Zamora about 1495. He rose by his talents to the highest offices of his order; and accompanied Philip II to England and the Netherlands, where he remained several years. Being called to the bishopric of Compostella, he prepared to enter upon the duties of this office; but died Feb. 11 (or 3), 1558, at Brussels. His principal writings are, Adversus Omnes Hæreses (Paris, 1584, fol.; Antwerp, 1556, 1568; translated into French, Rouen, 1712, 2 vols.):—De Justa Hæreticorum Punitio (Salamanca, 1547, fol.):—De Potestate Legis Penalit (ibid. eod. fol.; Paris, 1571, 1578, fol.):—De Sortilagiis ac Maleficiis, Eorumque Punitio (Lyons, 1568, 8vo):—Historia Ecclesiastica de la Ciudad de Guadaluza (Madrid, 1558), etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castro, Andres de, a Spanish Franciscan grammarian and lexicographer, a native of Burgos, was a missionary to the West Indies, and died in 1577. He wrote, Arte de Aprender las Lenguas Mexicana y Matlazingua:—Sermons:—and Christian Doctrine, in the same language. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castro, Cristoforo de, a Spanish Jesuit theologian, was born in 1551 at Ocaña, in the diocese of Toledo. He taught theology in the universities of Alcalá and Salamanca, and died at Madrid, Dec. 11, 1615. His principal work is, Commentarium in Duodecim Prophetas Minores (Lyons). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castro, Don Felipe de, an eminent Spanish sculptor, was born at Noya in Galicia, in 1711. He went to Lisbon, then to Seville, and afterwards to Rome, where he produced several fine works, which gained him a pension from Philip V, king of Spain. He took the prize in sculpture at the Academy of St. Luke, and was afterwards admitted a member of that institution, as well as of the Florentine Academy. On his return to his native country he executed, at Madrid, several admirable works; and in 1752 was appointed director of the Royal Academy of San Fernando. He died in 1756. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castro, Francisco de, a Spanish biographer of the 16th century, wrote, Miraculosa vida y Santas Obras del B. Juan de Dio (Granada, 1788). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castro, Giacomo di, an Italian painter, was born at Sorrento about 1597, and studied under Gio. Battista Caraccioli, and afterwards received some instruction from Domenichino. There are a number of his works in the churches of his native city, the best of which is his picture of the Marriage of the Virgin. He died in 1687.

Castro, Leon de, a Spanish theologian, canon of Valladolid, was for more than fifty years professor of Oriental languages at Salamanca, where he died in 1586. Though well acquainted with the Hebrew, he gave his preference to the ancient versions, especially the Vulgate. He asserted that the Hebrew text was corrupted by the Jews when they invested it with the vowel points. Castro's works are, Commentaria in Esaium (Salamanca, 1570):—Apologeticus pro Lectione Apostolica et Evangelica (ibid. 1585):—Commentaria in Oseam (1586). See Simon, Hist. Crit. V. T., lib. 3, c. 12; Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Castro, Pablo Fernando de, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Leon in 1581, and joined his order when fifteen years of age. He lectured on philosophy at Valladolid, and on scholastic theology at Salamanca, and died while rector of the college at Medina, Dec. 1, 1633. He wrote an Opus Morale in 7 vols. (Lyons, 1631-31; 5th ed. 1700). See Backer, Bibl. des Écrivains de la Compagnie de Jésus, s. v.; Mullendorf, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Castrucci, RAFFAELLE, an Italian theologian of the Benedictine order, was a native of Florence, and died in 1574, leaving Trattato di S. Cipriano (Florence, 1567):—Trattato del Sacramento dell' Eucaristia (Venice, 1570):—Libro Terzo di Sermoni di F. Agostino (Florence, 1572):—Harmonia Veteris et Novi Testamenti. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Castùlus is the name of several early Christians:

1. The zetarius, or manager of the summer and winter dining-rooms of Diocletian or Maximian. He lodged in a garret in the palace, and sheltered the Christians there. He was examined three times, then thrown into a pit, and finally buried alive. He is commemorated March 26, and a cemetery on the Via Lavicana is said to bear his name.

2. An Arian presbyter, whom Ambrose rescued out of the hands of the orthodox multitude at the time of the conflict about the basilicas at Milan (Ambrose, Epist. 20, 5).

3. A martyr along with Zoticus (q. v.) in Egypt or in Africa, Jan. 12.

4. A martyr at Ancyra, in Galatia, Jan. 23, according to the Hieronymian Mart.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Castùrus, Saint, a confessor and bishop of Vienne, supposed to have lived about the 8th century (Acta Sanctorum, Oct. vi, 545).

Castus is the name of several early Christians:

1. Bishop of Sicca Venerea (Kef), a proconsular province, near Musti, on the borders of Numidia (the town of Arnobius), spoke twenty-eighth in order in the Synod of Carthage (Sentt. Epp. sub-Cyt. vii).

2. Castus and Æmilius were two men who lapsed, and then made renewed confession; mentioned by Cyprian, under Decius, as having suffered some time before (Cyp. Laps. c. 13; Tillemont, iii, 125); and commemorated in the calendar of Carthage, by Bede, etc., on May 22.

3. A bishop, imprisoned along with pope Stephen, A.D. 257 (Anastasius, i, 1390, ed. Migne; Tillemont, iv, 31).

4. A bishop at the Council of Sinuessa, A.D. 303, and of Rome, A.D. 324 (Labbe, Concil. i, 940, 1545).

5. Bishop of Saragossa at the Council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (Labbe, Concil. ii, 658, 662, 678).

6. A Donatist bishop of Cella, at the Council of Carthage, A.D. 411 (Labbe, Concil. ii, 1379).

7. A presbyter of Antioch, who, in conjunction with Valerius, Diophantus, and Cyriacus, maintained the cause of Chrysostom and the orthodox clergy against the tyrannical intruder Porphyrius, by whom they were grievously persecuted.

8. Martyred, according to the Hieronymian Mart., Sept. 4.

9. A martyr at Capua, Oct. 6, according to the martyrologies.

10. Bishop of Porto in the third Roman Synod, A.D. 501; the fourth, A.D. 502; and the sixth, A.D. 504 (Labbe, Concil. iv, 1326, 1334, comp. 1377).

Castila. See CHASUBLE.

Caswall, HENRY, D.D., an Episcopal clergyman, was born at Yateley, Hampshire, England, in 1810, and educated chiefly at the grammar-school of Chigwell, Essex. When eighteen years of age, he came to America and graduated at Kenyon College, O. After having been engaged for some years as a parish minister and professor of theology in this country, he returned to England in 1842, obtained a private act of Parliament recognising the validity of his ordination in the United States, was appointed to the vicarage of Figheldean, Wiltshire, and became proctor in convocation for the diocese of Sarum, and prebendary of Salisbury Cathedral. He returned to America about 1868, and died at Franklin, Pa., Dec. 17, 1870. The main object of his life was to promote the consolidation and to increase the power of the great religious organization connected with the English Reformation. His principal work is America and the American Church (1839; 2d ed. 1851). See Encyclop. Britannica (9th ed.), s. v.

Caswell, Alexis, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Baptist divine and teacher, was born at Taunton, Mass., Jan. 29, 1799. He graduated with the honors of his class from Brown University, in 1822, and was at once appointed tutor in what is now Columbian University in Washington, D. C., where he remained five years, teaching, and pursuing his theological studies under the president of the institution. In the summer of 1827 he returned to New England, and in a short time received an invitation to preach for a Baptist Church newly formed in Halifax, N. S. He was ordained there Oct. 7, 1827. His services were most acceptable, and were attended with marked success. In the summer of 1828 he again returned to New England, with the expectation of becoming the assistant of the Rev. Dr. Gano, the pastor of the First Baptist Church in Providence, R. I.; but was elected in October professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Brown University. He entered immediately on the duties of his office, and was in full sympathy with the spirit and plans of Dr. Wayland, who had recently been called to the presidency. He taught not only the classes in his special department, but those of other departments until other professors should be appointed. In 1850 he took the department of astronomy, relinquishing that of natural philosophy. He remained in his office of professor thirty-five years, excepting one year, 1860–61, when he was absent in Europe. The next five years he passed in Providence, engaged in the benevolent institutions of the city, and occupied with literary work. Upon the resignation of Rev. Dr. Sears, Dr. Caswell was called to the presidency of Brown University, and held the office four years and a half, resigning in 1872. He was elected a trustee of the university in 1873, and a fellow in 1875, which office he held until his death, at Providence, Jan. 8, 1877. Among the published writings of Dr. Caswell are the following: Phi Beta Kappa Oration (1835);—Four Lectures on Astronomy, delivered at the Smithsonian Institute (1858);—Address before the American Association for the Promotion of Science, at Springfield, Mass. (1859);—A Memoir of the late Benjamin Silliman, read before the National Academy of Science in Washington (1866);—A Sermon on the Life and Christian Work of Francis Wayland (1867). See Lincoln, Alumni Address, June 19, 1877; The Providence Journal, June 20, 1877. (J. C. S.)

Caswell, Asa A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Derby, Vt., Feb. 4, 1850. He was converted in 1867, and ordained local deacon in 1874. In 1878 he joined the New Hampshire Conference, and was ordained elder. His first charge was that of supply at East Rochester. On his admission to conference he was appointed to Chichester, where he died, after three years of earnest and useful labor, June 18, 1881. He was an able, original preacher, esteemed by all for his social qualities and unaffected piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1882, p. 89.

Caswell, Enoch Haskin, a Congregational minister, was born at Middletown, Vt., March 25, 1818. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1843; studied at Union Theological Seminary, and graduated at Andover Theological Seminary in 1847. Salisbury, N. H., was his first charge, where he was also ordained in 1848. In the following year he removed to Stockbridge, Vt., where he served two years. His remaining pastorates—invariably short—were at Barnet, Vt., Hooksett, N. H., and Bennington. Caswell died at the latter place, Nov. 11, 1863. See Cong. Quarterly, 1864, p. 119.

Caswell, Jesse, a Congregational minister, was born in Vermont in 1809. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1832, and studied theology for one year in Andover Theological Seminary as a member of the class of 1837, and was also a student in Lane Theological Seminary from 1835 to 1837. He was ordained as a city missionary at Cincinnati, O., in 1837; was agent for the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in 1838; a missionary to Siam in 1839 and later; and died there, Sept. 25, 1848. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 127.

Caswell, Lewis E., a Baptist minister, was born at Salem, Mass., in 1795. He united with the Baldwin Place Church, Boston, in 1812; was ordained about 1833, and for five years was pastor in Meredith, N. H., and eight years in Ware. About 1847 he went to Boston and became a city missionary, in which capacity he labored thirty years. He died March 15, 1877. "He was a good man and especially kind to the poor. He was known but little on the platform and in the pulpit, but his record was in the homes of woe and in the chambers of sickness." (J. C. S.)

Caswell, William D., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born about 1820. He spent his early years in Massachusetts, and in 1831 removed with his parents to the state of New York. He was converted about 1840, and in 1845 united, by baptism, with the Church in London. He was licensed to preach in 1853, and in 1864 was ordained. His various fields of labor were in the states of New York and Illinois. He died in Edwards Co., Ill., April 30, 1868. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1870, p. 75. (J. C. S.)

Casyapa, in Hindû legend, was a disciple of Buddha, who presided at the first council of the Buddhists, after the death of Buddha at Rajagriha; five hundred priests assembled and made the first edition of the Buddhist books. Casyapa was the author of the book called Abhidharma (Metaphysics). He became the principal of one of the four classes of the Buddhist schools, named Vabhachica. He was a Brahmin converted to the faith of Buddha. His disciples were of five or six subdivisions, and were distinguished by the name of "the great community." See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Catabasia (Karabasia) was an anthem or short hymn in the Greek offices, so called because the two sides of the choir come down (karabaiouvai) into the body of the church and unite in singing it. It often occurs between the "odes" of a "canon;" and its construction is that of any other "troparion." Sometimes two "catabasia" occur together between each ode, as on the Sunday after Christmas-day, where each pair consists of the first troparion of the corresponding odes of the two canons for Christmas-day.

Catacombs. We give some additional particulars under this head.

1. The existence of Jewish Catacombs in Rome is of a date anterior to Christianity. One was discovered by Bosio early in the 17th century, and placed by him on Monte Verde, but has escaped all subsequent research. Another Jewish catacomb is still accessible on the Via Appia, opposite the Basilica of St. Sebastian. It contains two cubicula, with large arcosolia, ornamented with arabesque paintings of flowers and birds, devoid of distinctive symbols. Some of the loculi present their ends instead of their sides to the galleries—an arrangement very rarely found in Christian cemeteries. The inscriptions are mostly in Greek characters, though the language of some is Latin. Some bear Hebrew words. Nearly all have the candlestick. In 1866 another extremely plain Jewish catacomb, dug in a clay soil, was excavated in the Vigna Cimarra, on the Appian Way. In these Jewish catacombs we are to look for the germ of those built by Christians. See ROMÉ, JEWS OF.

2. As to the History of Christian Catacombs, it is best to discard the idea, so long prevalent, that these excavations were made in secret, and in defiance of existing laws. No evidence can be alleged which affords even a hint that in the first two centuries, at least, there was any official interference with Christian sepulture, or any difficulties attending it to render secrecy or concealment desirable. The ordinary laws relating to the burial of the dead afforded their protection to the Christians no less than to their fellow-citizens. Nor, on the other hand, was there anything specially strange or repulsive in this mode of burial adopted by the Christians. They were but following an old fashion which had not entirely died out in Rome, and which the Jews were suffered to follow unmolested. One law they were absolutely bound to observe, viz. that which prohibited interment within the walls of the city. A survey of the Christian cemeteries in the vicinity of Rome will show that this was strictly obeyed. Legal enactments and considerations of practical convenience having roughly determined the situation of the Christian cemeteries, a further cause operated to fix their precise locality. Having regard to the double purpose these excavations were to serve—the sepulture of the dead, and the gathering of the living for devotion—it was essential that a position should be chosen where the soil was dry, and which was not liable to be flooded by the neighboring streams, nor subject to the infiltration of water.

Tradition and documentary evidence have assigned several of the Roman catacombs to the first age of the Church's history. For some an apostolical origin is claimed. Four that present distinct marks of very early date are those of Priscilla, on the Via Salara Nova, of Domitilla, on the Via Ardentina, of Prætextatus, on the Via Appia, and a portion of that of St. Agnes. The evidence of early date furnished by inscriptions is but scanty; the most ancient thus indicated is of the 3d year of Vespasian, A.D. 72, its original locality being, however, unknown.

The beginning of the 3d century finds the Christians of Rome in possession of a cemetery common to them as a body, and doubtless secured to them by legal tenure, and under the protection of the authorities of the city. Hippolytus tells us that pope Zephyrinus "set Callistus over the cemetery." As at this period several Christian cemeteries were already in existence, there must have been something distinctive about this one to induce the bishop of Rome to intrust its care to one of his chief clergy, who in a few years succeeded him in the episcopate.

ishment of Christianity as the religion of the Roman States, was the commencement of a new æra in the history of the catacombs. Subterranean interment gradually fell into disuse, and had almost entirely ceased by the close of that century. The undeniable evidence of the inscriptions with consular dates shows that between A.D. 338 and A.D. 360 two out of three burials took place in the subterranean portions of the cemeteries.

The zeal displayed by pope Damasus, A.D. 366-384, in repairing and decorating the catacombs, caused a sudden outburst of desire to be buried near the hallowed remains of the martyrs. The flame, however, soon died out; but was replaced by pilgrimages to the sacred places. The fossor's occupation was, however, gone, and after A.D. 426 his name ceases to be mentioned. We have direct evidence (Anast. § 99) that the ravages of the Goths under Vitiges, when they sacked Rome, A.D. 537, extended to the catacombs. On their retirement the havoc was repaired by pope Vigilius, who replaced the broken and mutilated epitaphs of pope Damasus by copies, not always very correct.

The reverence for the catacombs was now gradually dying out. Successive popes attempted to revive it by their decrees, but without any permanent effect. John III, circa A.D. 568, restored the cemeteries of the holy martyrs, "and ordered that oblations" (the Eucharistic elements), "cruets, and lights should be supplied from the Lateran every Sunday." It is also recorded in commendation of Sergius I, A.D. 687-701, that when he was a presbyter it was his wont to "celebrate mass diligently through the different cemeteries."

We have now reached the period of the religious spoliation of the catacombs, from which they have suffered more irreparably than from any violence offered by sacrilegious hands. The slothfulness and neglect manifested towards these hallowed places are feelingly deplored by Paul I in a Constitution dated June 2, A.D. 761. Not only were sheep and oxen allowed to have access to them, but folds had been set up in them and they had been defiled with all manner of corruption. Paul resolved to transfer the bodies of the saints and enshrine them in a church built by him. His immediate successors endeavored to restore the lost glories of the catacombs, but owing to a change of feeling they were unsuccessful. As the only means of securing the sacred relics from desecration, Paschal, A.D. 817-827, translated to the Church of Santa Prassede, as recorded in an inscription still to be read there, no less than 2300 bodies. The work was continued by succeeding popes, and the sacred treasures which had given the catacombs their value in the eyes of the devout having been removed, all interest in them ceased. This, however, was revived by their being again discovered May 31, 1578. See CEMETERY; CRYPT; CUBICULUM.

CATACOMBS OF NAPLES, etc. To the north of the city of Naples four subterranean Christian cemeteries are known to exist, in a spur of Capo di Monte, no great distance from one another. They are known by the names of San Vito, San Severo, Santa Maria della Santita, and San Gennaro dei poveri. There is also a fifth at some distance under the monastic Church of San Efreimo. That of San Gennaro is the only one now accessible.

The Neapolitan catacombs differ very widely in their general structure from those of Rome. Instead of the low, narrow galleries of the Roman catacombs, we have at Naples wide, lofty corridors, and extensive cavern-like halls, and subterranean churches. The chief cause of this diversity is the very different character of the material in which they are excavated. Instead of the friable tufa granolare of Rome, the stratum in which the Neapolitan catacombs lie is a hard building-stone of great durability and strength, in which wide vaults might be constructed without any fear of instability. It is probable that these catacombs were originally stone quarries, and that the Christians availed themselves of excavations already existing for the interment of their dead. On this point Marchi (Monum. Primitivæ, p. 13) speaks without the slightest hesitation.

The Catacomb of St. Januarius derives its name from having been selected as the resting-place of the body of that saint, whose death at Puteoli is placed A.D. 303, when transferred to Naples by bishop John, who died A.D. 432. Mabillon speaks of three stories. Two only are mentioned by Pelliccia and Bellermann as now accessible. The galleries which form the cemetery proper are reached through a suite of wide and lofty halls, with vaulted ceilings, cut out of the rock, and decorated with a succession of paintings of different dates, in some instances lying one over the other. The earliest frescos are in a pure classical style, and evidently belong to the 1st century of the Christian æra. There is nothing distinctively Christian about these. In many places they have been plastered over, and on the new surface portraits of bishops, and other religious paintings, in a far inferior style and of a much later date, have been executed.

The interments are either in loculi, arcosolia, or cubicula. At the entrance of the lower piano we find a so-called martyr's church, with a slightly vaulted roof. It was divided into a nave and sanctuary by two pillars, the bases of which remain, with cancelli between. In the sanctuary stands the altar, built of rough stone, and a rude bishop's seat in an apse behind it. On the south wall are the arcosolia of bishops John, A.D. 432, and Paul, A.D. 764, who, according to Joannes Diaconus, desired to be buried near St. Januarius. In other rooms we find a well and a cistern, recesses for lamps, and the remnants of a Christian mosaic.

Among other Christian catacombs known to exist in different parts of the shores of the Mediterranean, of which we are still in want of fuller and more scientific descriptions, we may particularize those of Syracuse, known as "the grottos of St. John," and described by D'Agincourt as "of immense size," and believed by him to have passed from pagan to Christian use: the Saracen catacomb near Tuormina, with ambulacra as much as twelve feet wide; the loculi at right angles to, not parallel with, the direction of the galleries; each, as in the Roman catacombs, hermetically sealed with a slab of stone: those of Malta, supposed by Denon (Voyage in Sicile [Par. 1788]) to have served a double purpose, both for the burial of the dead, and as places of refuge for the living; and which, according to the same authority, "evidence a purpose, leisure, and resources far different from the Roman catacombs;" and those of Egypt. Of these last D'Agincourt gives the ground-plans of several of pagan origin. The most remarkable is one beyond the canal of Canopus, in the quarter called by Strabo "the Necropolis."

Very recently a small Christian catacomb has been discovered at Alexandria, described by De' Rossi (Bullettino, Nov. 1864, Aug. 1865). It is entered from the side of a hill, and is reached by a staircase, which conducts to a vestibule with a stone bench and an apse.

Catafalque (Ital. catafalco) is a large, hearse-like construction over a coffin, used in the lying-in-state of distinguished persons, as well as during the solemnization of the services for the departed.

Catalan (or Catalanian) Version of the Scriptures. The Catalan is a cognate of the Spanish language spoken in the province of Catalonia. There are two or three Catalan versions of the Bible (one of which bears the date 1407) preserved at Paris. One of these MSS. is deposited in the Royal Library, and contains a translation from the Latin of the entire Scriptures, with the preface of Jerome. Of other translations nothing is known. It was reserved to the British and Foreign Bible Society to furnish the Catalans with a version of the Scriptures in their own dialect. In 1832 this society printed, at London, an edition of the New Test., as translated by Mr. Prat, a native of Catalonia. A second edition was published in 1835 at London, and a third at Barcelona in 1837. The Psalms and Pentateuch have since been translated, but not yet printed. See Bible of Every Land, p. 265. (B. P.)

Catalani (or Catalano), Antonio (1) (called the Sicilian, or the elder), an Italian painter, was born at Messina in 1560, and probably studied at Rome. There is a fine picture of The Nativity by him in the Church of the Capuchins at Gesso. He died in 1630. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Catalani (or Catalano), Antonio (2) (called the Roman, or the younger), an Italian painter, was born at Bologna about 1596, and studied under Albano. He painted several pictures for the Bolognese churches. In the Church of La Madonna del Grada are four pictures of the patron saints of the city, in four niches; and in the Church Del Gesu, St. Peter Healing the Lame at the Porch of the Temple. He died in 1666. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Catalani, Giuseppe, an Italian theologian, who lived in the first part of the 18th century, wrote De Codice Sancti Evangelii (Rome, 1733, 4to):—Sacro-Sancta Consilia Ecumenica (ibid. 1736, fol.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Catalani, Michele, an Italian archæologist and biographer, was born at Fermo, Ancona, Sept. 27, 1750. At the age of sixteen he entered the Society of Jesus, and on the suppression of that society obtained a canonicate in his native town, and devoted himself to the study of ancient history. He collected a large number of documents of great value; but his principal writings relate to his native place. He died at Bologna early in the 19th century. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cataldus. See CATHALDUS.

Catalögus Hieraticus is the name given in the apostolic canons to the list of the clergy of a particular church. The term is also said to be applied to that part of the diptychs which contained the names of those, still living, who were named in the Eucharistic service; viz. of those who had made offerings, emperors, patriarchs, etc.

Catan (Cathan, Cadan, Ceddan, or Keddan), an early bishop and confessor, tutor of St. Blane, has his festival in the Irish calendars on Feb. 1, and in the Scotch on May 17. He is said to have been first connected with St. Patrick in Ireland, and then went to Scotland and settled in Bute, where he built his cell at Kilcathran, or Kilchattan, and educated his nephew St. Blane. Colgan thinks he flourished about A.D. 560, but others place him even in the 7th century. According to the Irish tradition he was buried in Ireland, and Catafalque.

St. Cadan's tomb is to this day shown beside the Church of Tamlaght Ard, County Londonderry; but according to the Scotch he lies at Kilchattan. His memory is honored by many dedications in the west of Scotland. There was also a Catan who died abbot of Kildare, A.D. 853.

Catana Manoa (the universal sea) is a name among the Achaguas, a tribe in the northern portion of South America, for the flood, of which mythological traces are found both in the old and new world. See DELUGE.

Cataneo, DANESE, a reputable Italian sculptor, was born at Massa di Carrara, flourished about 1555, and was a scholar of Sansovino. His greatest work was the altar and sepulchre of the celebrated Giano Freghoro, in Santa Anastasia, at Florence. He died there in 1573.

Catapæstaim, in Peruvian mythology, was the great New Year's festival, celebrated in honor of the sun by most of the Andes tribes.

Cataphronius is the name of several persons in early Christian records:

1. A pontiff of Thrace in A.D. 304 (Tillemont, Mémoires, v, 305). See PHILIP OF HERACLEA.

2. The persecutor of Eulalia (q. v.) is called by this name in some copies of her acts, in others Datus (Tillemont, v, 322).

3. Supposed by Tillemont (vii, 632) to have been an Apollinarist, and companion of Timotheus, and, on receipt of a letter from him, to have written to others of the same sect named Pausorius, Uranius, Diodorus, and Jovius. But from the passage to which he refers (Leontius Byz., adv. Fraud. Apollin., in Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxxvi, 1954), it appears rather that Cataphronius was an imaginary personage in a dialogue dedicated by Timotheus to Pausorius and others.

4. The præfect of Egypt in A.D. 356, who established the Arian bishop George at Alexandria, and persecuted the Catholics (Tillemont, viii, 157, 677; Athanas. i, 847).

Catchcart, ROBERT, a Presbyterian minister, came as a licentiate from Ireland, was received into New Castle Presbytery, April 15, 1730, and was sent to supply Middletown, Pa., and Brandywine, Kent, and Lewes, in Delaware. In December he was called to Kent, but declined, and settled at Brandywine, and, probably, at Middletown. In 1740 Catchcart began to preach in Wilmington. He died in 1754.

Catchi (or Cutchee) Version of the Scriptures. This dialect is vernacular to the province of Cutch, between the Gulf of Cutch and the Indus. A translation of the Gospel of St. Matthew into Cutchee was made by the late Rev. James Gray, one of the chaplains at Bombay, and in 1835 a small edition was printed. See Bible of Every Land, p. 117. (B. P.)

Cate, George W., a Baptist minister, was born at Uxbridge, Mass., in February, 1815. He graduated from Brown University in 1841, and from the Newton Theological Institution in 1844. He was ordained soon after as pastor in Barre, Mass., and died there in 1847. See Newton Gen. Cat. p. 28. (J. C. S.)

Cate, Noah, a Baptist minister, was born in Jefferson County, East Tenn., May 17, 1805. He was baptized in 1822, began to preach when but little more than a boy, and was ordained when only eighteen years old. He spent the early part of his ministry in East Tennessee, and was among the first Baptist missionaries in that section. In 1837, being in the employ of the State Convention, he took charge of the Church at McMinnville, Warren Co., and performed much itinerant work in Middle Tennessee. In 1842 he became pastor at Blountville, Sullivan Co. He remained in this section several years, and built up some of the most active and powerful churches in the state. In 1849 he removed to Abingdon, Va., and did good service in missionary work. Subsequently he returned to Tennessee, and itinerated in West Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, Kentucky, and Missouri. The closing years of his life were spent in Arkansas, where he died Oct. 23, 1871. See Borum, Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, p. 155-160. (J. C. S.)

Cate, William, a Baptist minister, brother of Noah, was born in Jefferson County, East Tenn., June 17, 1807. He united with the Church in 1837, was licensed in 1838, and ordained Jan. 24, 1840. In 1842 he took up his residence in Jonesborough. In 1841 he was appointed General Convention Agent for East Tennessee, and in the first year of his labors witnessed the conversion of five hundred persons. Several churches were formed as the result. While on a visit to Fayetteville, Ark., he died, Feb. 2, 1860. The personal appearance of Mr. Cate was particularly attractive. See Borum, Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, p. 160-166. (J. C. S.)

Catechumenum (or Catechumenium), was the place where the catechumens were assembled for instruction; also a high gallery in some churches, where women were present during the divine office.

Catel, FRANZ, a German artist, was born in Berlin, Feb. 22, 1778, and first acquired distinction by his illustrations of Goethe's Hermann und Dorothea. He went to Paris in 1807, and there began painting in oil. In 1809 he went to Rome, and in 1818 he visited the island of Sicily. In 1834 he painted a Resurrection of Christ, for the Luisenkirche at Charlottenburg, near Berlin. His works are to be found all through Europe. In 1841 he was made a member and professor of the Academy of Berlin. He died in Rome, Dec. 19, 1856. See Appletons' American Cyclop. s. v.

Catelani, BERNARDO, an Italian artist, was a Capuchin of Urbino, who lived about 1550. There are some of his works in the convent of his order at Cagli, and an altar-piece in the Church of the Capuchins, executed in the style of Raphael.

Catellan, JEAN DE, a French prelate, born at Toulouse, was bishop of Valence, and died in 1725, leaving, Instructions Pastorales:—Antiquités de l'Église de Valence (Valence, 1724). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Catena, GIAMBATTISTA, an Italian theologian and linguist, who lived about the middle of the 18th century, published, Girol. Gigli, Lezioni di Lingua Toscana (Venice, 1744, 8vo):—Lettere del Cardinale Gio. di Medici, etc. (Rome, 1752, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Catēna Patrum (chain of the fathers) is the name for a collection of passages from the old Church fathers, arranged according to the books of the Bible, which they are designed to illustrate. See COMMENTARY.

Cater, RICHARD B., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Beaufort District, S. C., in December, 1791, and was left an orphan when a child. In 1814 he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of South Carolina. For many years after he entered the ministry he was occupied in preaching in various parts of his native state. He died Nov. 24, 1850. Dr. Cater published several Sermons and Addresses, among which were two Discourses on Baptism, and one on Temperance. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 520.

Caterer, ISAAC, an English Congregational minister, was born at Tetsworth, Oxfordshire, in January, 1795. He grew up to early manhood sceptical and indifferent to Christianity, was converted at twenty-five, preached at various places, and in 1828 became pastor at Tetsworth. Here he labored both as school-teacher and preacher for seven years, and then removed to Peppard with his school, where he remained till his death, March 17, 1868. As a preacher Mr. Caterer was very laborious, and had great success. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1869, p. 240.

Catermole, JOHN, an English Wesleyan minister, commenced his ministry in 1763. Although a pious man, his gloomy disposition rendered the itinerancy a burden to him; so, after a year's service, he settled at Portsmouth-Common, opening a school, and preaching occasionally. He died about 1799, having published several useful tracts. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.

Cathalan, JACQUES, a French Jesuit and orator, was born at Rouen, May 5, 1671. He took a regular course of study, and taught the humanities in different colleges, but soon developed a manifest talent for preaching. He died Feb. 7, 1757. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cathan. See CATAN.

Cathari. The divinities of Arcadia were so called; as was a nation of Indians mentioned by Diodorus, whose wives attended the bodies of their husbands to the funeral pile, and were burned with them upon it. See SUTTEE.

Catharine of CARDONA, a nun, was so called because she spent most of her life in Spain, although born at Naples in 1519. She was intrusted with the instruction of Don Carlos, the son of Philip II; but she abandoned him because of his indocility, and joined the Carmelites as the companion of St. Theresa. She died in 1577. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Catharine, ORDER OF ST., of Mount Carmel, was a military order, established in 1063, in imitation of that of the Holy Sepulchre. The knights were bound by vow to observe the rule of St. Basil, to guard the body of St. Catharine, their patroness, to protect pilgrims, and to obey their grand master. They wore, upon a white dress, the instruments of the martyrdom of the saint, in the form of a cross, viz. a wheel of six spokes, armed with spikes, traversed by a bloody sword. The order is now extinct.

Catharistæ were a sect of Manichæans, who are said to have committed the most horrible impieties in the pretended consecration of their eucharist (August. Hær. 46).

Cathbadh (Lat. Cathubius). There are two saints of this name commemorated in the Irish martyrologies, on July 1 and Sept. 16. It is said that when St. Patrick first came into the north-east of Ireland, he built, among other churches, one in the country belonging to the descendants of Ængus, over which he placed two disciples, Cathbadus, a priest, and Dimanus, a monk. The former is perhaps the Cathubius, son of Fergus, abbot of Achadh-cinn, who, according to the Four Masters, died in 554, aged one hundred and fifty years. See Colgan, Tr. Thaum. p. 146, etc.; Lanigan, Ecclæs. Hist. Ir. i, 267, ii, 103.

Cathcan (also Cattalus and Cathal) is commemorated as bishop of Rath-derthaighe on March 20, in the Irish calendars; and at Lathrisk, in the parish of Falkland, Fifeshire, there was a dedication to a St. Cattel. Colgan suggests that Catheus, one of St. Patrick's disciples, may have had his name corrupted to Cathcan.

Cathcart, WILLIAM, a Presbyterian minister, was born near McEwensville, Pa., Oct. 19, 1823. He graduated from the University of Michigan in 1850, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1853; was ordained by the Presbytery of Fort Wayne, Nov. 23, 1854; was stated supply at Lagrange, Ind., in 1853; pastor there from 1854 to 1864; and died at Lima, Ind., May 17, 1870. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 177.

Cathedra. (1) The first and strictly ecclesiastical application of this word is to the seat of the bishop in his episcopal church. (2) The word was afterwards transferred to the episcopal see itself. Tertullian (De Præscript. xxxvi) speaks of "Cathedræ Apostolorum," meaning the specially apostolic succession of the bishops of those sees. (3) Later, the word became used for the Episcopal Church itself, "principalis cathedra," in Conc. Aquisgr., A.D. 789, can. 40, meaning the cathedral as opposed to other churches in the diocese.

CATHEDRA PETRI. See PETER, FESTIVALS OF.

Cathedral (Latinized Gr.), a church which contains the cathedra or seat of the bishop. In the earliest cathedrals, the basilicas or large churches in Rome, the bishop's seat was a marble chair attached to the end wall behind the altar, which was at the west end of the church, and he officiated over the altar, which was low; so that he always looked towards the east, or the rising sun, the great emblem of the resurrection from the earliest times. Among the ordinances of pope Clement, A.D. 93, was one that in every church one chair should be placed in a more lofty and prominent position, so that the bishop sitting in it could overlook all persons present, and be seen by them. This marble chair is often called the cardinal's chair, because when the church was served by a cardinal it was his seat, but the name of cardinal is not primitive. This arrangement of a marble arm-chair fixed against the wall on the level of the upper bench round the apse is found in some of the early crypts in Rome as early as the 7th or 8th century, but none have been observed earlier.

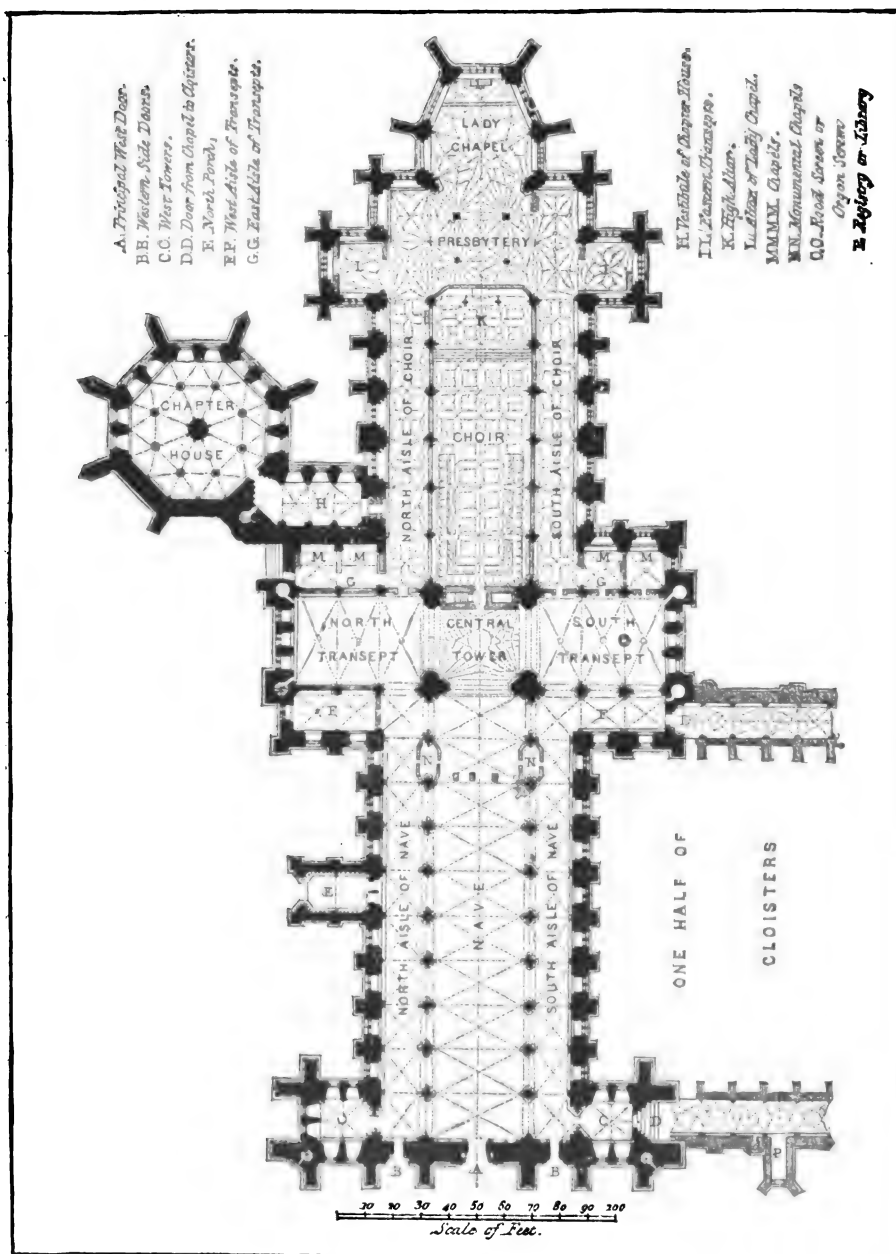

In the mediæval cathedrals the Lady-chapel takes the place of the apse, and the bishop's seat or throne is usually on the south side of the nave, eastward of the stalls for the canons. The choir is enclosed in its own solid screen, with a space between the east end of the screen and the Lady-chapel. In England, Wells exhibits the most perfect example of a cathedral with all its parts and appurtenances. Both nave and choir, as well as presbytery, have aisles. There is a second transept eastward of the altar between that and the Lady-chapel. The chapter-house is on the north side of the choir, and joins the eastern corner of the north transept, its vestibule being parallel to that transept on the east side of it. This is the same at York, and it is the most usual plan, although there is no rule for the place of the chapter-house. The two transepts have each two chapels on the east side, and an aisle on the west; the aisle communicates at the south end with the cloister, which is on the south side of the nave, and has the library over it on the east side, and the singing-school on the west. The nave has aisles on both sides, and another transept at the west end, with towers at the extremities; there is also a central tower and a north porch.

Wells was a cathedral proper, not monastic, but with a separate house for each of its officers, either in the Close or in the Liberty adjoining to it. The bishop's palace, of the 13th century, is enclosed by a separate moat, and fortified—it is on the south side of the cloister, from which it is separated by the moat; the deanery and the archdeaconry, of the 15th, are on the north side of the Close, with some of the canons' houses; the organist's house is at the west end, adjoining to the singing-school and the cloister; the precentor's house is at the east end, near the Lady-chapel. The vicars choral have a Close of their own joining the north-east corner of the canons' Close, with a bridge across through the gatehouse into the north transept; they were a semi-monastic body, with their own chapel, library, and hall, but still were chiefly laymen.

The cathedral church was also called parochia, the principal or mother church, and in some places still the High Church. In it coronations, ordinations, councils were held, manumissions of serfs made, and academical honors conferred. The word is confined to the Western Church, and is not older than the 10th century. The cathedraticum, or payment to the bishop for the honor of his see, called in Italy La chierica, was paid in the time of Honorius III by all the diocesan clergy; and in later days St. Richard's pence at Chichester, St. Chad's pennies at Lichfield, Pentecostals and smoke-farthings elsewhere, were the tribute of the diocese to the cathedral church, and a compensation for an omission to visit it at Whitsuntide.

A cathedral is composed of a corporation of canons presided over by a bishop. In some rare cases, as Pistoia and Prato, Lichfield and Coventry, and Bath and Wells, a bishop had two cathedrals; and occasionally a collegiate church was united to a cathedral, as at Dublin. The system was established in large towns for mutual aid, and as a central station for missionary operations. Cathedrals were of two kinds: such as were served by a composite body of monks and clerks under rule, and immediately governed by the abbot-bishop as his family and household; and collegiate churches, with chapters of clerks under an archpriest, but having the bishop as the head of the capitular body. Gradually the itinerant clergy, who were sent out on Sundays and festivals to the surrounding district, settled down as permanent parish priests, while those who remained about the bishop became his standing chapter. There were cathedrals of regular canons in many places, of Premonstrants at Littomissel, Havelburg, and Brandenburg, and of Austin canons, in a few cities. The cathedral of Alcalá is called magistral, because all the canons have the degree of D.D. Ramsbury, exceptionally, although a see, had no chapter. At Canterbury and Worcester, two minsters, occupied by the clerks and monks respectively, adjoined each other, till the bishop definitely assumed one as his cathedral. At Winchester, and in London, at Westminster, the monks built a separate minster; at Worcester and Winchester they absorbed the canons; at Exeter they gave way to them; at Canterbury, Durham, Rochester, and Norwich they only gradually gained the ascendant when the Norman policy removed sees from villages into towns, as in the instance of the translation from Thetford to Norwich, and Selsea into Chichester, as, about forty years earlier, had been the case of Exeter, removed from Bodmin, and Salisbury from Wilton; and half a century yet earlier, in the foundation of Durham. With the exception of Monreale and Monte Cassino, and some early foundations in Germany, colonized from Britain, in England only there were monastic cathedrals. These were Canterbury, Winchester, Durham, Bath, Carlisle, Ely, Norwich, Rochester, Worcester; and being refounded at the Reformation as secular cathedrals, along with the newly created sees of Chester, Bristol, Peterborough, Oxford, Gloucester, and Westminster, they are known as cathedrals of the new foundation. Those of the old foundation, which always had secular canons, are York, St. Paul's, Wells, Chichester, Exeter, Hereford, Lichfield, Lincoln, Salisbury, and the four Welsh cathedrals. The bishops of Meath, Ossory, Sodor and Man, Argyll and the Isles, Caithness, Moray, Orkneys, and Galloway did not take their titles from their sees. Some German cathedrals, as Bamberg, Cammin, Breslau, Laybach, Meissen, Olmutz, like those of Trent and Trieste, are exempt that is, free from visitation by the archbishop of the province, and immediately subject to the see of Rome. See CHURCH EDIFICE.

CATHEDRALS OF THE NEW FOUNDATION are those which were, before the Reformation, held by Benedictines, or by Austin canons, as Oxford, Bristol, and Carlisle, or as Ripon and Manchester had been collegiate churches. The chapter consists only of residentiaries, who, till the recent act, were called prebendaries; the corps of the prebend being the dividend or yearly income of each stall. The minor canons were originally equal in number to the major canons; and out of their number the precentor and sacrist are annually chosen.

CATHEDRALS OF THE OLD FOUNDATION are those which have always been held by secular canons, and underwent no change at the Reformation. These consist of four internal dignitaries—dean, precentor, chancellor, and treasurer; archdeacons, in some cases of a subdean, and subchanter of canons, and prebendaries and canons, residuary or nonresident, internal or extraneous. Each was represented by his vicar. Strasbourg, in France, alone retains its full complement of members and ancient organization; but in Spain, Italy, Germany, and Austria all are preserved intact. The cathedrals of Elgin, Ross, Aberdeen, and Caithness were modelled on Lincoln, which followed Rouen; those of Dunkeld, Glasgow, and St. Patrick's (Dublin) on Salisbury, which followed Amiens; as St. Paul's imitated Paris in its constitution, and is now the model for Carlisle and Peterborough.

Cathedratium was the name anciently given to two kinds of ecclesiastical tribute to a bishop:

1. A pension paid annually to the bishop by the churches of his diocese, "in token of subjection," "pro honore cathedralis," the payments being limited by two councils to two shillings severally. This was sanctioned by the Council of Braga in 560 (canon ii), and although the acts of that council contain the first allusion to it that we possess, they speak of it as a custom then in general use. This is not only one of the most ancient episcopal rights, but the most universal, and is still commonly observed. The only difference between the jura cathedralica and synodalia is, that the former was paid during a visitation, the latter at the synod; but it seems to have been the same impost.

2. A fee paid by the bishop to the bishops who had consecrated him, and to the clerks and notaries who assisted.

Cathedratious (Doctor) is a Spanish university term, to designate one who fills a chair; a professor.

Cathel (Cathal, or Cattel), Saint, is perhaps Cathcan (q. v.), of March 20, in the Irish calendars.

Cathelinot (or Catelinot), ILDEPONSE, a Benedictine monk of the congregation of St. Vanne and St. Hydulphe, the coadjutor of Calmet, was born at Paris in 1670. He became a monk at the age of twenty-five in the abbey of St. Mansuy of Toul, and was engaged in preaching for several years. He passed a part of his life in the abbey of Senones, whose very large library afforded ample materials for his researches. His chief printed work is a supplement to the Bibliothèque Sacrée of Calmet, inserted in the fourth volume of the first edition of the Dictionnaire de la Bible. He was the editor of Les Lettres Spirituelles de Bossuet, published in 1746, 8vo. He finally became librarian of the abbey at Saint-Mihiel, and died there, June 15, 1756. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cather, ROBERT G., LL.D., an Irish Methodist preacher, was born at Omagh, County Tyrone, June, 1820. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. An alarming accident, at the age of nineteen, led to his conversion. He soon began to preach; in 1841 was a student in the Hoxton Theological Institution; in 1842 was in the Irish itinerancy, and labored successfully for some years as a travelling preacher. He conceived the idea of forming a society for promoting systematic giving to the cause of God, and the Irish Conference consented to his devoting all his time and energies to the working out of that idea. The Systematic Beneference Society and then the Christian League were the result. He travelled over England, Ireland, the Continent, and in America to advocate his plans. Much good was the result, but the work broke down his health; he sank rapidly, and suddenly closed a useful life at Clapham, London, Nov. 21, 1879.

Catherin (Lat. Catherina), an early saint, has dedications in Scotland and Ireland. She is probably St. Catharine, the martyr of Alexandria (Forbes, Kal. of Scott. Saints, p. 299).

Catherine. See CATHARINE.

Cathirius is the name of several early Christians:

1. Bishop of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, present at the Council of Nice (Tillemont, vi, 643; Labbe, Concil. ii, 54).

2. Bishop of Arpona, at the heretical Council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (Labbe, Concil. ii, 711).

3. Bishop at the Council of Saragossa, A.D. 381. In this and the previous case the name is spelled Catherius; the last name with a variation, Cartherius. In Gams's Series Episcoporum the name of the bishop of Arpona is given as Carterius.

Cathisma is a section of the psalter. (1) The psalter in the Greek office is divided into twenty sections, called cathismata. Each cathisma is subdivided into three stases, and "Gloria" is said at the end of each stasis only. The reason for the name assigned is that, while the choir stand two and two by turns to recite the psalms, the rest sit down. (2) A short hymn which occurs at intervals in the offices of the Greek Church. It consists of one stanza or troparion (ᾠδὴ τροπικὴ), and is followed by "Gloria." The name is said to indicate that while it is sung the choir sit down for rest.

Cati, PASQUALE, a Roman painter, flourished during the pontificates of Gregory XIII, Sixtus V, and Clement VIII. He was employed in the Vatican, where he painted The Passion of Christ, and several friezes in the Sala Clementina. He also painted the chapel of cardinal Alemps, with subjects from the life of the Virgin. He died in the pontificate of Paul V, aged seventy.

Catina is mentioned by Jerome (v, 12, ed. Vall.) as an author who gave a mystical interpretation of Ezek. i, 7, etc.

Catius, in Roman mythology, is said to be the name of the god who gave the faculty of wit.

Catizi, in mythology a race of pigmies, supposed to have been driven from their country by cranes.

Catlett, THOMAS K., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Albemarle County, Va., in 1798. He was converted about 1819, and called to the ministry at Staunton. He attended school at Wytheville, and there continued until 1825, when he united with the Holston Conference. He suddenly died Feb. 25, 1867. Mr. Catlett was a man of industrious habits, iron constitution, and burning zeal. His intellect was somewhat peculiar—strong, original, and in some respects eccentric. No man of his conference ever presented a greater variety of subjects in a plainer style, and produced a more lasting impression. He was mighty in the Scriptures, a man of prayer, and spotless in life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1867, p. 154.

Catlin, Oren, a Presbyterian minister, was born in New York. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1818, and at Andover in 1822. He was ordained Sept. 26, following. In 1823 he labored in Illinois. He assisted in organizing the First Presbyterian Church of Greene County, at Carrollton, in the same year. He was pastor at Warren, Mass., in 1829 and 1831; stated supply at Cincinnati, N. Y., in 1832 and 1833; at Castleton, from 1834 to 1837; at Fairport, from 1838 to 1841; at Newstead, in 1842 and 1843; and at Collins, from 1844 to 1846. He died at Evans, N. Y., Aug. 11, 1850, aged fifty-five years. See Norton, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Illinois; Trien, Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 50.

Catlin, S. T., a Baptist minister, was born at Montville, Me., in 1819, and was ordained in 1839. He was pastor of several churches in his native state, and in 1851 removed to Hudson, Wis. In 1854 the American Baptist Missionary Union appointed him a missionary among the Indians. Subsequently he preached at Osceola, St. Croix Falls, and Taylor Falls, Wis. He died May 1, 1878. He was a faithful and successful pioneer preacher, a man of good ability, and highly esteemed by the churches that knew him. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 196. (J. C. S.)

Catlin, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Maine in 1811. He removed to Zanesville, O., with his father when six years old; was converted in 1837; served the Church as class-leader, exhorter, and local preacher; and in 1862 entered the Ohio Conference, wherein he labored with zeal and fidelity until his death, in 1856. Mr. Catlin was an interesting and useful preacher, of ordinary ability; a minister of the common people. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1856, p. 113.

Catlow, John Booth, an English Congregational minister, was born at Gisburn-in-Craven, Yorkshire, Oct. 4, 1820, of Wesleyan parents. He was converted in his fifteenth year, and was put under private training in London for the Wesleyan ministry. He became pastor of the Congregational Church at Hounslow, where he was ordained, March 22, 1854, and labored eight years. Thence he removed to Lindfield, Sussex. Early in 1865 he accepted a call to Soham, Cambridgeshire, where he was very successful. In 1873 Mr. Catlow became pastor of Zion Chapel, Ashbourne, where he remained until his death, March 5, 1877. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1878, p. 309.

Catlow, Jonathan, an English Wesleyan preacher, began his ministry when about sixteen years of age. After travelling for several years, he settled at Keighley, Yorkshire, where he died about 1763. His funeral sermon (from 1 John iii, 2, at his own request) was the commencement of a great revival in the neighborhood. Catlow was a good man, and shared in the dangers which beset the pathway of the early Methodist ministers. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.

Catmer, George, an English martyr, was one of five burned at Canterbury in September, 1555, for the true testimony of Christ and his works. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 383.

Catmer, Joan, an English martyr, was one of five burned at Smithfield, Jan. 31, 1556, for her constancy in the belief of Christ and his works. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 750.

Catnach, John, a Scotch clergyman, studied at the University of Aberdeen; became tutor at Zetland; was licensed to preach during episcopacy, and was again licensed by the presbytery in 1698, and called to the living at Unst the same year, and ordained. He died in May, 1717. See Fusti Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 441, 442.

Caton, William, a member of the Society of Friends, was born in England about 1635. When quite young, he seems to have been the subject of very marked religious impressions. In 1652 he became an avowed Friend. Shortly after he began to preach "in steeple-houses and markets," and soon experienced the usual persecutions of Quaker preachers in those days. He made a religious visit to Holland in 1655, and repeated it the next year. At Middelburg he was arrested, in August, 1656, and cast into prison, where he remained several days, and, when taken out, was placed on board a ship of war to be sent back to England. He endured great sufferings for about two weeks, but was not discouraged, and soon went again to Holland, where he remained about a year, laboring in various cities, and then returned to England. In 1659 he went once more to Holland, and, after several months' labor, took ship for England, but came very near being taken by a pirate, and barely escaped shipwreck in a fearful storm. In 1661 he went to Germany, where he was very kindly received by the prince palatine, in Heidelberg. Aug. 4, 1663, he was arrested and thrown into prison in Yarmouth, England, where he remained until Feb. 22, 1664. After many trials, and a life of constant activity in his calling, he died in Holland, it is supposed, in November, 1665. He was the author of An Abridgment of the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, etc. (Rotterdam, 1661, 1689). See the Friends' Library, ix, 434-479. (J. C. S.)

Catoptromancy (κάτοπτρον, a mirror, and μαντεία, prophecy), a species of divination by which objects or persons are alleged to appear to the eyes of a spectator in a mirror. See DIVINATION.

Catosus was a Christian cook of Hippo (Augustine, Civ. Dei, xxii, viii, 9).

Catrou, François, a French preacher, was born at Paris, Dec. 8, 1659, and died Oct. 18, 1737. He was intrusted with editing the Journal de Trévoux, a periodical published by the Jesuits, which obtained considerable renown in the 18th century. He also published some historical works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cats (Catz, or Caets), CHARLES, a Brabant theologian of the beginning of the 18th century, was at first an adherent of the Roman Church, but later went into Holland, joined the Socinians, and was imprisoned for the translation of the New Test. into Dutch, but afterwards was released. He then settled at Embden, in Prussia, but was compelled to remove. He wrote, also, Jesus Christus ist der Sualigmaker der Welt (Amsterdam, 1697). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Catta, in Northern mythology, was one of the wise women, or fortune-tellers, of the Germans. She is probably the same as Jetta, "a sorceress."

Cattaneo, LAZZARO, an Italian missionary, was born at Sarzana, near Genoa, in 1560. He joined the Jesuits, and was sent with Ricci to China. They founded together the religious establishment of Macao. Cattaneo died at Hang-chow in 1640, leaving some works in Chinese, which were intended for the propagation of Christianity. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cattani (da Diacetto), Francesco, an Italian theologian and prelate, was born at Florence. He joined the Dominicans in his native place, and became canon of the cathedral there. As such he assisted at the Council of Trent, and was appointed to the bishopric of Fiesole, Aug. 15, 1570. He died Nov. 4, 1595, leaving Italian translations of St. Ambrose's Christian Offices (Florence, 1558, 4to):—his Hexameron (ibid. 1560, 8vo):—Dell' Autorità del Papa (ibid. 1562, 8vo):—Sopra la Superstitione (ibid.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cattani, Gaetano, an Italian missionary, was born at Modena, April 7, 1696. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1719, and was sent to Paraguay as a missionary in 1729, where he died, Aug. 28, 1733, leaving three Letters addressed to his brother Joseph (Paris, 1784, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cattanio, COSTANZO, an Italian painter, was born at Ferrara in the year 1602, and studied under Scarsellino, and afterwards under Guido, at Bologna. His Ecce Homo, and The Flagellation, in San Giorgio at Ferrara, have been much admired; also his picture of Christ Praying on the Mount, in San Benedetto, and his Annunciation, in Spirito Santo. He died in 1665.

Cattapani, LUCA, an Italian painter, was born at Cremona about 1570, and was a scholar of the Campi. The best of his compositions is his Decollation of St. John, in San Donato at Cremona.

Catterick, THOMAS, an English Wesleyan minister, labored from 1816 to 1820 in Fredericton, N. B., Kingston, Fort Wellington, and Niagara, Ont., and Shefford, Quebec; and from 1820 to 1851 in various charges in England. In 1851 he retired from the active work, settled at Wednesbury, Staffordshire, and died April 21, 1861. He was a man of powerful voice and strong faith, meek in disposition, and unshrinking in the performance of duty. He published, Observations on Benevolence, chiefly designed for the benefit of the poor in the Methodist society (Lond. 1828). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1861, p. 18.

Cattle, WILLIAM, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Driffeld, York, in January, 1813. When quite young he was converted, and at once joined the Methodists. For several years he was employed as a prayer-leader and local preacher, and in 1836 was accepted at the conference as a travelling preacher. He faithfully labored till 1857. Failure of health caused him to hold a supernumerary relation four years; returning health enabled him to take work again in 1861; but eleven years afterwards his health again failed, and he retired to Walsall, where he spent the remainder of his life. He died there Aug. 29, 1880. His noble and manly presence was associated with strong individuality of mind and character, and with much warmth and cordiality of spirit. He had an almost chivalrous sense of honor. His preaching was evangelical, practical, and useful. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1881, p. 15.

Catton, JAMES, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Nottingham in 1796. He was converted in his twenty-fourth year, was accepted for the ministry in 1823, and died at Grantham, Aug. 20, 1863. He was diligent and cheerful; his intellect was original and powerful; and his ministrations effective. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1863, p. 10.

Cattwg Ddoeth (the wise). See CADOC.

Catulinus is the name of several persons in early Christian history:

1. (Also Catullinus) The subdeacon at Cirta, under Paul the bishop, A.D. 303. On May 19, in that year, after the church furniture had been given up, he was called upon to surrender the books, but only produced one very large volume, as the readers had the rest. When asked the readers' names, both he and Marcucius refused to answer. Though "traitors," they would not be "traitors" (proditores). They were arrested; but we do not hear of the end of Catulinus's imprisonment.

2. The deacon, martyr at Carthage, buried in the basilica of Faustus in that city; commemorated July 15, and honored with a sermon by Augustine (according to Possidius), which is no longer extant (Tillemont, v, 554).

3. The sixth bishop of Embrun (Ebredunum). He subscribed at the Council of Epaune (Epaunum, Epavnum), which was held in 517, when Sigismund was king of Burgundy and Hormisdas pope. While executing the decrees of this synod in his city he was ejected by the Arians, and took up his residence at Vienne, with Avitus the bishop. He passed years of exile devoted to good works (Gall. Christ. iii, 1060).

Catuual was an abbot succeeding Bectunus, mentioned in a charter of Cynewulf, king of Wessex, A.D. 789.

Caucaubardites were a branch of the Eutychi-ans, who, in the 6th century, followed the party of Severus of Antioch and the Acephali, rejecting the Council of Chalcedon, and maintaining one nature only in Jesus Christ.—Niceph. Hist. Eccles. xviii, 49.

Cauchon, PIERRE, bishop of Beauvais, took an active part in the contest of the parties which divided France in the beginning of the 15th century. In 1429 the inhabitants of Beauvais drove him from his see on account of his vices and tyranny, and he took refuge in England. He made himself infamous by his bigotry and fury towards Jeanne d'Arc, who was taken captive in May, 1430, within the limits of the diocese of Beauvais. Cauchon became her accuser, and addressed himself to the king of England, and finally succeeded in securing her condemnation and death. He died suddenly in 1443. He was excommunicated by Calistus III, and his body was dug up and thrown into the common sewer. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caukerken, CORNELIUS VAN, a Flemish engraver, was born at Antwerp in the year 1625. The following are some of his principal works: The Dead Christ in the Lap of the Virgin; The Descent of the Holy Ghost; St. Anna with the Young Virgin Mary; The Martyrdom of St. Livinus; Magdalene and St. John.

Caulla, SIGISMONDO, a painter of Modena, was born in 1637. He studied under John Boulanger, and afterwards visited Venice, where he studied the works of Titian and Tintoretto. He painted altar-pieces, and cabinet-pieces for private collections. The best of his large pictures is one of The Plague, in the Church of San Carlo, at Modena. There are works by him dated 1682 and 1694.

Caulacau is a sacred word (handed down with varieties of spelling, apparently a corruption from "קָדֵשׁ", "precept upon precept," Isa. xxviii, 10) in some of the Gnostic systems. The first mention of the name is found in the account given by Ireneus (i, 24) of the Basilidians. Theodoret (Har. Fab. i, 4), borrowing his account from Ireneus, says that it was to the Lord and Saviour that they gave the name Caulacau. The next mention of the word occurs in the earlier work of Hippolytus, on heresies, where it is named under the heading of the Nicolaitans. By some of these it was applied to a certain archon (Epiphanius, Har. 25); but according to Philastrius (Har. 33), to mankind. In the later work of Hippolytus, Refutation of all Heresies, the use of Caulacau is ascribed to the Naasenes, who used the word "man" in speaking of the principle of the universe. This principle they held to be threefold, and Hippolytus says that they gave the name Caulacau to the blessed nature of the heavenly man (the Adam above). Saulasau to the mortal nature below, and Zeesar to that of those who had been raised from earth to receive the heavenly birth, by which it is to be supposed their own disciples are indicated.

Caulet, Étienne François de, a French prelate, was born May 19, 1610, at Toulouse. He studied at the Sorbonne in Paris, and was in 1644 raised to the episcopal see of Pamiers. He introduced many reforms, and reorganized the schools and seminaries. Though a Jansenist, he took an active part in the controversy concerning the Right of Regalia (q. v.). He advocated the rights of the Church and of his diocese, but without success. He died Aug. 7, 1680, leaving, Traité de la Régale (Cologne, 1680), and some minor works. See Rapin, Mémoires (Paris, 1865); Recherches Historiques sur l'Assemblée du Clergé de France de 1682 (2d ed. 1870); Loyson, L'Assemblée du Clergé de France de 1682 (Paris, 1870); Jungmann, in Wetzlar u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Caulet, Jean de, bishop of Grenoble, and grand-nephew of the foregoing, was born at Toulouse, April 6, 1693. He was a great scholar, and secured the regard and affection of his diocese. He died Sept. 27, 1771, leaving a considerable number of Sermons and Letters, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caulfield, CHARLES, D.D., a bishop of the Episcopal Church in the West Indies, died at Nassau, Sept. 4, 1862. He was the first bishop of the Bahama Islands, and was consecrated Nov. 24, 1861. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev., April, 1863, p. 154.

Caulicōli are small volutes under the flowers on the sides of the abacus in the Corinthian capital, representing the curled tops of the acanthus stalks. Also, like the large volutes, continued in the Norman style, and may even be traced, though much modified in form, in later styles.

Caumartin, JEAN FRANÇOIS PAUL Lefèvre de, a French prelate, was born at Châlons-sur-Marne, Dec. 16, 1668. He was educated under the care of cardinal de Retz, his godfather, who assigned him one of the richest benefices. Caumartin had scarcely reached his twenty-sixth year when he was admitted a member of the French Academy. He was appointed bishop of Vannes in 1717, and died at Blois, Aug. 30, 1733. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Caumont, ARCISSE DE, a French archæologist, was born at Bayeux, Aug. 28, 1802. He founded the Société des Antiquaires de Normandie and Société Française d'Archéologie pour la Conservation des Monuments Nationaux, which held annual sessions, and published the results of their investigations in the Bulletin Monumental, which Caumont edited till 1872. He died April 15, 1873, at Caen. Besides numerous contributions to different periodicals, he published Histoire de l'Art dans l'Ouest de la France (1831-40, 6 vols.) :—Abécédairé ou Rudiments d'Archéologie (1850-62, 3 vols.; 3d ed. 1869). (B. P.)

Caupōna (or a tavern). The apostolical constitutions enumerate the caupo, or tavern-keeper, among the persons whose oblations are not to be accepted. If such oblations were forced on the priest, they were to be spent on wood and charcoal, as being only fit for the fire. A later constitution still numbers the caupo among those who could not be admitted to the Church unless they gave up their mode of life. It is clear, from too many evidences, that the ancient tavern differed little from a brothel. A constitution of Constantine (A.D. 326), while declaring that the mistress of a tavern was within the laws as to adultery, yet if she herself had served out drink she was classed among tavern servants, who were "not deemed worthy to observe the laws." A cleric found eating in a caupona, unless under the necessities of travel, was, by the apostolical canons (46th), sentenced to excommunication. The Council of Laodicea enacts that none of the priestly order, from the presbyter to the deacon, nor outside of the ecclesiastical order, to the servants and readers, nor any of the ascetic class, shall enter a tavern. In spite of these enactments, we find by later ones that clerics, who were forbidden to enter taverns, actually kept them. Thus certain "Sanctions and Decrees," from a codex at the Vatican, but evidently from a Greek source, require that the priest be neither a caupo nor a tabernarius.

In the East, it appears that in the first half of the 6th century, and presumably since the days of Constantine, taverns were held on behalf of the Church. But apparently this tavern-keeping for the Church was not held equivalent to tavern-keeping by clerics, since the 9th canon of the Council of Constantinople in Trullo, A.D. 691, orders "that it shall not be lawful for any cleric to have a tavern." He must therefore either give it up or be deposed. It will thus appear that while the severity of the apostolical constitutions against the individual tavern-keeper is not followed in later times, yet that the Western Church, at least during the anti-Carlovigian period, persistently treated the use of the tavern by clerics, otherwise than in cases of necessity, still more their personal connection with it, as incompatible with the clerical character. The witness of the Eastern Church is also to the same effect, but its weight is marred by the trade, including that in liquors, which for two centuries at least seems to have been carried on at Constantinople for the benefit, not, indeed, of individual devices, but of churches and charitable foundations.

Causæ Majōres is a term of the canon law, meaning cases relating to the great questions of the Church; they are of three kinds: (1) such as relate to the faith; (2) such as regard doubtful and important points of discipline; and (3) such as relate to conduct on the part of bishops involving deposition.

Causby, STEPHEN, an English Congregational minister, was born in London, in September, 1811. He joined the Church in his youth, and in 1833 entered Hackney College. On leaving college he preached some time at Wadebridge, Cornwall; settled as pastor at Hallaton, Leicestershire, in 1838; removed to Kelvedon in 1845, and in 1851 to Towcester, where he labored seven years, and then resigned the stated ministry. He died June 16, 1860. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1861, p. 208.

Cause (Causation, Causality). These are associated terms in connection with a fundamental topic in the highest range of philosophical speculation.

I. Definition of Cause.—This will always be determined—at least so far as the real import of the term is concerned—by the character of the theory in which it constitutes an essential part. Therefore, it cannot be given without reference to such theory, at least so as to convey either a clear or a fixed meaning. The significance of the word must, accordingly, be derived from the tenor and conclusions of the connection. The objection to the received definitions is, that they assume at the outset what is to be explained by the close. This is true of Reid's definition of the popular idea of Cause. "Causa est id, quo posito ponitur effectus, quo sublato tollitur." So, in Whewell (Phil. Ind. Sci. pt. i, bk. iii, chap. ii, p. 159): "By Cause we mean some quality, power, or efficacy, by which a state of things produces a succeeding state." The words, "effectus," "power," "efficacy," "produces," beg the question, and require explanation and acceptance in advance of the definition.

As a preliminary and provisional exposition, for the purpose of inquiry, we may be permitted to say, that Cause is the agency, real or assumed, in the production of change; Causation, the exercise of such agency; and Causality, the bond of connection between the antecedent condition and the subsequent change. Causation and Causality are, however, frequently used as equivalent terms. It will not escape the notice of those familiar with investigations of the present character, that there is a latent petitio principii in the introduction of the words agency and production. This acknowledged paralogism, noted already by Hume, is inevitable, from the peculiarity of the subject, from the implications of words, and their multiplicity of meanings. The fallacy involved will not be directed to the support of any conclusion. It is admitted and tolerated simply to furnish a point of departure for the doctrine of Cause, Causation, and Causality.

Before proceeding to this task, it is requisite to discriminate between the ordinary and the metaphysical employment of the term Cause. The word is full of ambiguities, and is a shifting homonym in both characters. In customary usage, as a common expression, which has passed through many successive stages of metaphor and degradation, to descend to its current laxity and vagueness, it indicates the immediate, or remote, agency of change; the motive, the occasion, the aim, the accidental, partial, antecedent, or concomitant condition of a phenomenon, without distinguishing, or even regarding, the diverse character of these several applications. With these loose meanings there will be no need to be concerned, except so far as they may illustrate the fluctuations of the philosophical import, by reflecting in their variety the speculative perplexities whence they have arisen.

Cause in Metaphysics may be said to be the connection between two states of being, the one consequent upon the other. This awkward circumlocution is employed to prevent, as far as may be, the introduction of any phrase which would virtually beg the question, or anticipate the conclusion. The absence of any precise and suitable terminology; or, rather, the indistinctness, variability, and inapprehensibility of the idea of what is spoken of, which occasions such absence, necessitates the adoption of this unsatisfactory procedure. Yet it may be said that, in spite of the acute and varied speculations of the philosophers, every one has a fixed, if unanalyzed, conception of Causation. To this indeterminate notion, present in the mind, reference must always be had, as a support for the reasoning, in order to render any argument on the subject intelligible.

To Aristotle (Metaph. i, ii; Phys. Ausc. ii, iii) is due the well-established division of Causes into—1. Formal, or qualitative, τὸ τι ἵν' εἴναι, which gives the quiddity, per quod. 2. The Material, or Substantive, ex quo. 3. The Efficient, a quo. 4. The Final, propter quod. This celebrated classification was seen to be invalid, by Reid (Works, p. 75; ed. Hamilton). It is rather an analysis of the ambiguities of speech, consequent upon ambiguities of thought, than a legitimate distinction. Careful and discriminating reflection would apparently indicate that these species do not belong to one and the same genus. The division is not made on one plane—not in accordance with one principle. It is scarcely possible to refer to the same order of conceptions, that the joiner made the table, that the table was made of wood, that tables require the character exhibited by them, and that the table is made to put victuals on.

The Final Cause, or the result contemplated, is rejected by Bacon and Descartes, and by many of the most rigorous reasoners; but is maintained by Leibnitz and other perspicacious inquirers. The aim is an inducement, but it cannot be properly considered as part of the act of Causation, whatever Causation may be. The purpose for which a thing is done is surely diverse from the act or operation by which it is done.

The Material Cause has been strenuously held to be an indispensable part of the process resulting in an Effect. By some writers it has been regarded as the sole cause. Aristotle considers that, in some cases, Cause and Effect are conjoint and logically simultaneous—the one is involved in the other. Hamilton asserts that all Secondary Causes — (all causes but the "Great First Cause")—are Siamese twins, the Material Cause necessarily participating and co-operating with the Productive Cause. This is true in a certain sense. There must be a subject to be acted on. "Esse debet, unde fiat aliquid, deinde a quo fiat." No effect can arise unless it arises in something. But the idea of Cause is entirely dissimilar in regard to the agent and in regard to the passive element.

The Formal Cause—the Plutonic archetype—the natura naturata—the plan—the aggregate of qualities constituting a thing "what it is," and pre-adapting it to exhibit under suitable incitement the characteristic phenomena, is, in most schemes, analogous, ex parte natura, to the Material Cause, and is obnoxious to similar censure. The Aristotelian Form must be distinguished from shape, as well as from the Platonic Idea.

The Material and the Formal Cause are rather prerequisites, indispensable concomitants, conditions, aptitudes, than any part of the act or idea of Causation. No doubt, the qualities of the things in which the change is evolved, and the relations of constitution between them and the stimulant which excites the change, regulate the occurrence and the character of the Effect; but they do not aid in the apprehension of the abstract idea, or act of Causation. They do not touch the conception of Causality. The Efficient, or Motive Cause, that which involves the manifestation of power, according to Kant, is the only form which directly conveys the conception of Cause (cf. Aristot. Metaph. XI, iv, 6). Therefore, in endeavoring to estimate the nature of Causation, it is the species which will be exclusively regarded. Occasional Causes belong to an entirely distinct inquiry. See MALEBRANCHE. Other Causes, which might be added to Aristotle's specification, such as Exemplary Causes, with which Formal Causes are often identified, and Instrumental Causes, are equally to be disregarded.

II. Theories of Causation.—The theories and modifications of theories of Causation are very numerous, and often reappear in strange combinations. It is not appropriate to discuss them in this place. Sir William Hamilton has done this very ably and elaborately (Discuss. App. i; Metaph. § xxxix, xl), if not always with entire satisfaction. He has added a Table, in which he has endeavored to classify the several systems which have met with any considerable acceptance, excluding, of course, the doctrine of the First Cause, the primordial, or immanent operation of the Creator. Hamilton's Table is introduced, as it may save much explanation which would otherwise be required.

Judgment of Causality, as	A. Empirical, a Posteriori.	a. Original or Primitive.	1. Objective. Perception of Cause, external and internal.
		b. Derivative or Secondary.	2. Subjective. Perception of Causal Efficiency, internal.
	B. Noetic, a Priori.	c. Original.	3. Objective. Induction, Generalization.
		d. Derivative.	4. Subjective. Association, Custom, Habit.
			5. Necessary. A special principle of Intelligence.
			6. Contingent. Expectation of the Constancy of Nature.
			7. From the Law of Contradiction.
			8. From the Law of the Conditioned.

This classification is, like all Hamilton's dissections, acute, arbitrary, plausible, incomplete—systematic, but delusive from its apparent thoroughness. There are other actual and possible theories, Schopenhauer's, for instance, which he has not provided for in his scheme. Hamilton makes eight classes, all of which he rejects as "wholly worthless," except the last, which is his own, and is open to as grave objections as those which he repudiates. He distributes all his recognised opinions between two summa genera: A, the Empirical, or a posteriori; and B, the Pure, Noetic, or a priori. The former set, by making the conception of Causation a mere result of experience, renders it nothing more than an empty Ens, or, rather, Phantasma Rationis. Locke, Hume, and Brown are types of these schools.

It may be observed, in passing, that the contemptuous terms in which Hamilton speaks of Brown's theory, which he includes in the sixth class, but which is more analogous to Locke's, may be retorted upon his own. "It evacuates the phenomenon of all that desiderates explanation," and "eviscerates the problem of its sole difficulty." The Empirical systems may be confidently repudiated as inadequate explanations of the mystery, for the reasons assigned by Hamilton, and for others not specified by him. A ready concurrence may also be accorded to his refutation of two of the Pure theories—the sixth and seventh. But there is one of them, besides his own, the fifth, that which is maintained in diverse modifications "by Descartes, Leibnitz, Reid, Stewart, Kant, Fichte, Cousin, and the majority of recent philosophers," which cannot be discarded so readily. Its consideration may be postponed till Hamilton's original theory has been noticed.

Hamilton's scheme rests avowedly, as might have been expected, on the Philosophy of the Conditioned. He does not succeed in making it evident that it is a logical consequence of his peculiar philosophy. He says: "We cannot know, we cannot think, a thing except as existing, that is, under the category of existence; and we cannot know or think a thing as existing, except in time." Now the application of the Law of the Conditioned to any object thought as existent, and thought as in time, will give us at once the phenomenon of Causality (Metaph. p. 552). There is a quibble in the word "existence" which need not be dwelt upon. The reasoning is per saltum, if not a palpable non sequitur. There is no connection manifest between the inference and its supposed foundation. Moreover, Causation, the principle of change—id a quo forma mutatur—is completely eliminated from consideration.

Hamilton refers the belief in Causes, which is not identical with the idea of Causation, to the impossibility of conceiving any new existence to commence, or any existence to be annihilated. The impossibility of conceiving an absolute commencement of existence is a thesis as old as Aristotle, (Met. Min. II, i). But it can only suggest the catenation of existence, it cannot of itself suggest Causation. Hamilton illustrates his position by the line: "Ex nihilo nihil, in nihilum nil posse reverti." He thus places himself on the ground of Stoic Pantheism or Epicurean Materialism. His dogma would only justify, "omne post aliquid, sed non infinite aliquid ante omnia." In consonance with this fallacy, he confirms his doctrine by representing the Creation as evolved out of the Creator. This accords with his identification of the causatum with the cause; or the "absolute tautology between the effect and its causes."

There is a further error in the assertion, that of Second Causes "there must always be a concurrence of two to produce an effect." This is true only in regard to Material Causes, whose introduction into the specific doctrine has already been objected to. It is not true of Efficient Causes. It is the complete absorption of Cause in the mere juxtaposition of conjoint conditions, and the acceptance of this conjunction as Causation, which necessitate the tenet.

The incapability of thinking an absolute commencement or an absolute termination results only in the necessity of thinking of existence as continuous, either as unchanged or as changed in novus formas. It does not touch the question of Causality, which is the connective between successive states, and the determinant of each sequence. The succession or conjunction is thus unconsciously converted into the equivalent of Causation; and the doctrine reverts to Hume's. There is logical legerdemain in the prompt substitution of a conclusion entirely distinct from it for the actual quæsitum.

It may be suspected, too, that the intellectual impotence, which is the character of the Philosophy of the Conditioned, can in no wise furnish a valid basis for any theory. It cannot authorize or explain any positive conviction; yet every one has such a conviction in regard to Causation, and cannot get rid of it. At most, it can conclude only negatively. Here, if anywhere, the maxim, "Ex nihilo nihil," is applicable. But whatever interpretation be given to Causation, the conception of Cause and its alleged manifestation is distinctly affirmative. Sir William Hamilton's reasoning only goes far enough to show how and when the idea of Cause intrudes, not what is its essential character. His conclusion is, to retort his own language, "a virtual assumption of the question," or something worse.

It merits continual meditation that the words most current and most indispensable in daily intercourse—Being, Mind, Substance, Matter, Space, Time, Cause, Force, Power, Quality, especially involve the highest and most insoluble problems of philosophy, and are vacillating in meaning. These terms are all positive, and convey very positive meanings, impossible as it may be to define or to comprehend them. The fact of their necessity and familiarity is something more than presumptive evidence of the veracity of the underlying conviction. It may be taken as irrefragable proof, that, in all our mental operations, there is present, not merely "aliquid ignotum et incognoscibile," but that this unknown constituent of thought is the kernel, the life, the truth of all thought. This is the aliquid latens in the beautiful and profound extract from cardinal Cajetan, cited by Hamilton (Disc. p. 627), and is fully recognized by Leibnitz (Opp. v, p. 374), Reid and many others. It is noted here, because it will be involved throughout the remarks with which this article will conclude; and because a complete comprehension of Causation is impossible: "Id tum supra nos est quam ipsa veritas."

Hamilton's reasoning appears to be invalid. His doctrine crushes out all reality of Causation, and all significance in the term. There is no genuine Causation where there is no recognition of an act eventuating in change. There is thus only one theory which has not been rejected by Hamilton, not as inherently insufficient, but as unnecessary. This is the doctrine that the conception of Cause is intuitive; that it is due to a distinct principle in man's intellectual constitution. It may be untenable in the forms in which it has been presented, and yet it may contain the germ and the spirit of the truth. So far as it needs examination here, it will enter into the further consideration of this mysterious problem, which no one should venture to say that he has solved. It is prudent, however, by way of caution, to say that such tenets as "innate ideas," "principles of intelligence," "intuitive perceptions" do not require the admission of formulated dogmas, developed faculties, or matured apprehensions. It is sufficient if the distinct tendencies which end in such results are recognised as actual characteristics of the mind.

III. Possible Explanation of the Idea of Causation.—Sir William Hamilton, as has been seen, distributes the various theories of Causation into eight classes, and arranges them, by a quadripartite procedure, under two supreme heads—the Empirical and the Pure. So far, only the latter aggregate has been considered. It may be asked, with much hesitation, whether these two summa genera may not be united in one explanation. No theory on any subject can be held to be complete, certain, and satisfactory, which does not incorporate, or subsume, all special or partial theories, revealing the fragmentary truth which each contains, and affording the means of explaining the mutilations, aberrations, and falsities of each.

The space at our command, and the design of the present article, would render it inappropriate to propound on this occasion any novel and systematic theory of Causation, though all theories but one have been rejected, and the exceptional one has not been allowed to be satisfactory. Still, it may be appropriate to add some observations tending to make more distinct, and to render more coherent, the character of Causation. This may, perhaps, be achieved by pointing out in what manner experience and the constitution of the human mind concur in the generation of the idea of Cause. It will scarcely be denied that the human intelligence is adapted, or apt, for the reception of knowledge from the external world, and from personal observation and experience. There will be as little difficulty in admitting that internal and external experience both contribute to the excitation and determination of distinct procedures of thought, and to their results. If these things be so, there is neither incongruity nor improbability in conceiving that the continual reactions of native aptitude and outward stimulation may develop into clearness faint tendencies, without either originating definite conceptions. Such conceptions may be the joint production; while they will be deemed purely Empirical, or purely Intuitive, by those who contemplate only one set of the interacting and co-operating processes.

Experience, by itself, cannot furnish the idea of Cause, for Causes are nowhere directly subjected to observation, not even the results of volition. Intuition alone is equally powerless, for there is neither evidence nor likelihood that it should give a distinct, definite, formal conception. Such a conception cannot be entertained without words—without the words of the language in which the conception is expressed. Words and language can be no part of intuitive knowledge. But there may be—indeed, there must be—a preconcert to apprehend under suitable conditions (the most important of which will be the just occasion) the significance of those things with which the mind has to deal. The acorn on a bare rock will not produce an oak, though by nature constituted for such production. The richest soil without the acorn will be equally inoperative in this regard. The potential oak is in the acorn; the fit soil, and the airs and dews of heaven, convert the potency into act, make the acorn swell and disclose the germ, tender and feeble, and hitherto concealed, whose powers are developed and strengthened and increased, till it grows into the monarch of the woods. With the modus operandi, the latens schematismus of the two factors, we have no concern at present. These are entirely removed from human apprehension. Yet they are most important considerations in the case, but not the Cause. That lies still further beyond. But the fact of Causation—the presence of what is competent to bring about the result—the existence of a Cause, cannot be ignored. Now, what has been described as taking place in the vegetable world may be believed or conceived to be analogous to what takes place in intellectual growth. The mind may be compared to the acorn: experience and observation may correspond to the soil, and the air, and the dew. Analogies are, indeed, no argument, but they may be indispensable to render intelligible what is only confused and obscured by direct statement, in consequence of the ambiguities and irrelevant implications of language.

All intellectual faculties, all intuitions, if such exist, are in their primitive exercise unconscious and unintelligent. They are blind instincts. The child sucks, as the bee builds its cell, without the capacity of recognising or reflecting upon the nature of the operation. There is a spontaneous process, a cæcus appetitus, which guides its action. As acts are repeated, as experience is enlarged, as faculties are expanded, there arises an awakening consciousness of ability to perform the action, and to govern it by the will.

The spontaneous processes required for the subsistence of the infant thus convert themselves, under the instigation of the surroundings, into conscious actions. The idea of purpose and result, dimly, but with growing distinctness, develops itself, till it becomes a conscious principle, and the subject of incipient reflection.

The hungry child will point to its vituals; the thirsty one, able to move about, if left alone, when of larger growth, will crawl or walk to the glass of water. It learns that the satisfaction of its wants may be secured by its own action. The repetition of such experiences fixes and brightens the perception that deliberate acts will produce definite results. When the process is multitudinously varied by the innumerable occurrences of daily life, the power to do what is designed is recognised, even if the mind has not yet analyzed its operations, or distinguished and named the several exercises of its faculties: "as the temple of the mind grows wide withal," this analysis is executed with more or less clearness and accuracy. The perception of power becomes habitual, and potency in action is discerned. The power of producing, by one series of acts, another, diverse, dependent, and co-related series of acts, is ascertained, tested, and demonstrated. What is thus unfolded in individual experience is analogous to the changes presented to observation. Fire is applied to gunpowder. The gunpowder explodes. There is power in fire to explode gunpowder. The contact or conjunction of the two things is followed by an explosion. The power, or ability, of the fire to change the state of the gunpowder is the Cause of the explosion. There is something more here than the sequence of conditions: "Alia est causa efficiens, alia procedens."

Again, an act of the will may occasion sitting down, standing up, walking, running, eating, etc. There is a conscious and indisputable connection between the volition and the ensuing state, though the manner of the change may be unrecognisable. A hot coal on the flesh will produce pain. A glass of wine will eventuate in speedy exhilaration. How these things are brought about cannot be fully told; but it must be apprehended that the change is more than succession of events, and is dependent upon what went before. The Cause and the Effect are both known, and are known as Cause and Effect.

Notwithstanding the vast alteration of the primitive instinct, appetency, or tendency, which conduces to the final recognition of Cause in all changes of condition, there is nothing anomalous or surprising. Such conversion of potencies into dissimilar forms is the universal law of the mental and physical world. The transmutations are not more marvellous in the intelligence than the growth of the plant from the seed, of the leaves from the plant, of the flower from the leaves, of the fruit from the flower. Metempsychosis and metematomosis are the law in the realms of mind and of matter.

There is much in this exposition which has been unwillingly, but necessarily, excluded. The briefest possible outline has been given. Enough may, however, have been said, to show that the constitution of the animal and the spiritual nature of man necessitates processes which, under external stimulation, with constant development, in connection with the reactions of experience and observation, eventuate in the inevitable apprehension and conviction of Causation in all change. Thus, the Empirical and the a priori theories of Causality are combined, and both are required to account for the idea of Cause.

IV. Literature.—We indicate only a few leading authorities. It is scarcely possible to give the Literature of Causation in extenso, because the materials are various and are widely and brokenly disseminated through the whole range of Metaphysical investigation:

Aristot. Met. I, iii; III, ii; V, ii; Seneca, Ep. lxx; Locke, II, xxi, xxvi; Leibnitz, Nouveaux Essais; Hume, Works; Reid, Works; Stewart, Phil. Essays, I, ii; Brown, Inquiry; Hamilton, Discussions (Appendix to Reid); Whewell, Phil. Ind. Sciences; Cousin, Hist. Phil. Mod.; Mill, Logic; Mansel, Metaphysics, ap. Encyclop. Brit.; McCosh, On the Divine Government; Bain, Emotions and Will; Fleming, Vocabulary of Philosophy; Irons, Final Causes; Bowne, Metaphysics. (G. F. H.)

Cause, La (the cause), is the name by which the French Huguenots under Condé designated their association and its objects.

Causser, Joseph, an English Methodist minister, was born at Norton-Stockton, Shropshire, Sept. 25, 1816. He was early converted, joined the Primitive Methodist Society, entered their itinerant ministry in 1842, and during thirty-one years labored in eighteen circuits, till failing health obliged him to take a supernumerary relation in 1873. He continued to preach as strength permitted, until his death at Monmouth, Wales, July 16, 1881.

Causler, A. G., a Baptist minister, was born in South Carolina in 1825, and began to preach in 1852. For fifteen years he labored with zeal and success in his native state. In 1867 he removed to the northern part of Arkansas, and after spending a few years in that section of the state, he went to the southern part, and labored for some time among the churches in the Columbia Association. He died in 1872. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 197. (J. C. S.)

Causse, Johann Isaac Ludwig, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, in 1728, and studied theology there. In 1752 he was appointed professor of theology at his native place, and died April 28, 1802. He wrote, Commentatio ad Luc. xii, 1-5 (Frankfort, 1749):—De Vera Significatione Vocis כִּנְיָ; Observationum ad Christianorum Baptismum Pertinentium Spicilegium (ibid. 1752):—De Sobrio Doctoris Theologiae Tituli Usu Christianæ Religionis Indolui non Repugnante (ibid. 1793). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 245. (B. P.)

Caussin (de Perceval), Armand Pierre, a French Orientalist, was born at Paris, Jan. 11, 1795. In 1821 he was appointed teacher of the vulgar-Arabic at the college of Oriental languages in Paris, was made professor of Arabic in the Collège de France in 1833, and in 1849 he was elected member of the Academy. He died Jan. 15, 1871, leaving Essai sur l'Histoire des Arabes Avant L'Islamisme (Paris, 1847-49, 3 vols.):—Grammaire Arabe Vulgaire (ibid. 1824):—Dictionnaire Français-Arabe. (B. P.)

Causton, Thomas, an English martyr, was a native of the county of Essex, and a zealous Christian. He would not attend mass, and was, therefore, taken prisoner and sent to London. His examination began Feb. 17, 1555; he was commanded to recant his errors and come to the unity of the Popish Church, which he refused to do. The examination continued until March 4, 1555, when Causton made a public confession of his faith. After he had finished this, the bishop hurried him off to Newgate, where he remained fourteen days in prison, and was then taken to Raleigh, in Essex, and burned, March 26, 1555. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vi, 729.

Cautelæ Missæ are certain regulations concerning the office of holy communion, like those at the end of that office in the book of common prayer, only more minute, and entering into extreme detail.

Cautelam, Absolutio ad, is a term of the canon law. When a priest is under sentence of excommunication or interdict, from which he appeals, he is obliged to obtain letters of absolution ad cautelam, to enable him to celebrate, pending the hearing of the appeal.

Cautinus was bishop of Clermont about A.D. 562, previously deacon at Issore. The first appearance of Cautinus after a reminiscence of his diaconate is at the death of St. Gallus, bishop of Clermont. He was at this time archdeacon. The people wished to have Cato for their bishop, but the archdeacon went by night to the king and obtained the episcopate for himself before the appearance of the messengers of his rival. Cautinus was well received by the greater part of the clergy and people of Clermont. There was nevertheless a schism in the see, and Cautinus at last took away from his opponents all Church property, restoring it only to those who became reconciled to him. We next find Cautinus seeking to obtain for Cato the see of Tours, on the death of Gunthas, the bishop. This offer Cato rejected. Cautinus was very intemperate, and finally became epileptic. The last mention of him is at the time of a pestilence which devastated Clermont, when he fled from place to place to escape disease; but returning at length to his episcopal city, he died, at Easter, of the plague. (See Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc.)

Cavagna, Giovanni Paolo, an Italian painter, was born at Borgo di San Leandro, near Bergamo, in 1560, and probably studied under Titian. His best fresco work is The Assumption in Santa Maria Maggiore, at Venice. Two of his best oil paintings are The Nativity and Esther before Ahasuerus, in the same church. His most noted picture is The Crucifixion, in Santa Lucia. He died in 1627. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cavagna, Pietro Francesco, a Bolognese historical painter, was born in 1675, and studied under Domenico Viani. He was employed in decorating the Bolognese churches. In the Church of Sts. Sebastian and Rocho is his paintings of The Conception, St. Sebastian, and St. Roch. In San Colombaio are pictures of St. Nicholas and St. John the Baptist; and in San Giuseppe The Nativity. Cavagna died in 1733.

Cavagni, Giovanni Battista, a Neapolitan architect, flourished about 1585. In connection with Vicente della Monica, he erected the church and convent of San Gregorio Armeno, at Naples. The Sacred Monte della Pietà was also erected by Cavagni, and secured for him great reputation. He died in 1600.

Cavalca, Domenico, an Italian ascetic theologian of the order of Dominicans, a native of Vico Pisano, in Tuscany, who died in 1842, was remarkable for his talent as a preacher. Besides several Italian translations, he left, Tractato Dicto Pange Lingua (Rome, 1742, 1751):—Specchio di Croce, etc. (Milan, 1780, 1784, 1787; Rome, 1738):—Frutti de la Lingua (Florence, 1793; Rome, 1754). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Cavalcabo (Baroni), Gaspere Antonio, an Italian painter, was born near Rovereto in 1682, and studied under Antonio Balestra at Venice, and afterwards under Carlo Maratta at Rome. He executed many beautiful works, particularly an altar-piece in the choir of the Carmine, in his native place, with four lateral pieces of great merit. He died in 1759. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cavalieri, Giovanni Michele, an Italian theologian of the order of Benedictines, was a native of Bergamo. He was connected by a very close friendship with Vincente Orsini, who made him his theologal, on becoming archbishop of Benevento. He died there in 1701, leaving, Galleria de' Sommi Pontifici, Patriarchi, Arcivescovi et Vescovi dell'Ordine de' Predicatori (Benevento, 1796, 2 vols. 4to):—Tesoro delle Grandezze del SS. Rosario (Naples, 1713, 3d ed. 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jücher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cavalieri, Marcello, an Italian theologian of the order of Dominicans, brother of Giovanni Michele, was born at Bergamo about 1649. After having been professor of philosophy at Naples, he became vicar-general of cardinal Vincente Orsini, and then bishop of Gravina, in 1690, where he died in 1705. His principal works are, A Treatise on the Mass (Naples, 1686):—Constitutiones Synodales (1693):—A Treatise on the Construction of Churches (in Italian, several times reprinted). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cavalleri (or Cavallieri), GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an Italian engraver, was born near Brescia about 1580, and worked at Rome from 1550 to 1590, where he died in 1597. He executed about three hundred and eighty plates, of which the following are the principal: The Last Supper; The Dead Christ held by the Virgin; The Descent from the Cross; The Animals Coming Out of the Ark; John Preaching in the Wilderness; The Murder of the Innocents; The Conversion of St. Paul; The Elevation of the Cross. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cavallini, PIETRO, an old Roman painter, was born in 1259 (or 1279); studied under Giotto, and practiced the Mosaic art as well as engraving. He assisted Giotto in the mosaic over the principal entrance to St. Peter's. His most important work in oil was the picture of The Crucifixion, at Assisi. His principal work in fresco was in the Church of Ara Celi, in which he represented the Virgin and Infant, surrounded with glory, and below, the emperor Octavian, with the sibyl, directing his eye to the figures in the air. He died at Rome in 1344 (or 1364). See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cavallucci, ANTONIO, an Italian painter, was born at Sermoneta in 1752. His principal paintings are, St. Bona Distributing her Wealth to the Poor, at Pisa; St. Francis of Paula, in the Basilica di Loreto. He died at Rome in 1795. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cavanilles, ANTONIO JOSÉ, a Spanish ecclesiastic, who devoted himself to botany, was born at Valencia, Jan. 16, 1745. He was educated by the Jesuits, in the university of that town; became tutor to the sons of the duke of Infantado, whom he accompanied to Paris, and remained there twelve years. He was afterwards director of the Royal Garden at Madrid. In 1789 and the following years he published Dissertations upon Monadelphous Plants, and in 1790 he commenced to issue his work on the plants of Spain, and those discovered by Spanish navigators in Mexico, Peru, Chili, New Holland, and the Philippine Islands. He died at Madrid, in May, 1804. See Encyclop. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cavarazzi, BARTOLOMEO (called Crescenzi), a painter of Viterbo, was born about the year 1590, and studied under Pomerancio. He painted a great deal for the Roman churches. In the Church of San Andrea della Valle is a picture by him, of St. Carlo Kneeling, with a Choir of Angels. In Santa Ursula he has painted that saint with the famous Legend of the Eleven Thousand Virgins; also A Holy Family, in the convent of St. Anna. He died in 1625.

Cavazzoni, FRANCESCO, an Italian painter, was born at Bologna in 1559, and studied under Passarotti, and afterwards in the school of Caracci. His principal works are at Bologna. The most admired are, Magdalene at the Feet of Christ, in Santa Madalena; The Crucifixion, in Santa Cecilia; and St. John Preaching, in San Giovanni. He was living in 1612.

Caveat, in English ecclesiastical law, is a caution entered in the spiritual courts to stop probates, licenses, administrations, etc., from being granted without the knowledge of the party that enters it.

Cavedone, GIACOMO (or JACOPO), an eminent Italian painter, of the Bolognese school, was born at Sassuolo, near Modena, in 1577, and was instructed by the Caracci. He afterwards went to Venice and studied the works of Titian. His most celebrated picture is in the Church of the Mendicanti at Bologna, representing

St. Alo and St. Petronio Kneeling before the Virgin and Child, with a glory of angels. In San Paolo are his fine pictures of The Nativity and The Adoration of the Magi. In the Ospitale di San Francesco is his Holy Family, with St. John and St. Francis. In San Michele is The Last Supper, and in San Salvatore, The Four Doctors of the Church. Cavedone died, miserably poor, in 1660. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cavedoni, CELESTINO, an Italian priest and antiquarian, was born May 18, 1795, at Levizzano, near Modena. He studied at Modena and Bologna; was in 1821 custodian of the numismatic collection at Modena, and in 1847 librarian there, also professor of Biblical hermeneutics at the university from 1830 to 1863. He died Nov. 26, 1865, leaving Numismatica Biblica (Modena, 1850; Germ. transl. by Werthof, 2 parts, Hanover, 1855-56);—Confutazione dei Principali Errori di Ernesto Renan nella sua Vie de Jésus (Modena, 1863). (B. P.)

Caveirac, JEAN, a French theologian, was born at Nîmes in 1718. At the time when the question arose whether toleration should be given to the Protestants or not, he published the following works: La Vérité Vengée (1756);—Mémoire Politique-Critique, etc. (1757);—Apologie de Louis Quatorze et de son Conseil sur la Révocation de l'Edit de Nantes, etc. (1758);—Appel à la Raison, des Ecrits Publiés contre les Jésuites de France (Brussels, Paris, 1762, 2 vols.). He was an antagonist of J. J. Rousseau, and published Lettre d'un Visigoth à M. Fréron, sur sa Dispute Harmonique avec M. Rousseau (Paris, 1754);—Nouvelle Lettre à M. Rousseau de Genève (ibid. 1754), etc. He sided with the Jesuits, and was banished in 1762, but afterwards returned, and died in 1782. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Cavellus. See MACCAGHWELL.

Caverly, JOHN, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in New Hampshire in August, 1799. He was converted in 1824, and became a member of the Third Church in Strafford, N. H. He began to preach about a year afterwards; was ordained Sept. 6, 1827, and was soon called to the pastorate of the Fourth Church in Strafford, where he remained until his death, March 28, 1863. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1863, p. 91. (J. C. S.)

Cavernense CONCILIUM. See AFRICAN COUNCILS.

Caverno, ARTHUR, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Barrington, N. H., April 6, 1801. He is said to have been of Scotch-Irish descent, his ancestors of the same name having come to America in 1735. He was converted at seventeen, at nineteen was licensed, and in 1823 was ordained. For a year or two he taught school and preached. A church having been gathered in Epsom, N. H., in 1824 he was chosen pastor, and remained there until 1827, and then accepted a call to Contoocook village, in Hopkinton. In 1830 a remarkable revival of religion was enjoyed by his Church, as the result of which it more than doubled its membership. From 1833 to 1836 he was pastor at Great Falls; from 1836 to 1838 financial agent for Strafford Academy; and in 1838 and 1839 pastor of the Roger Williams Church in Providence, R. I. His other pastorates were in Charlestown, Mass.; Bangor, Me.; Candia, N. H.; Dover; Biddeford, Me.; Gardiner, South Parsonsfield, and First Church, N. Berwick; and last, a second time, in Candia. His last residence was in Dover, N. H., where he died, July 15, 1876. He wrote for the Morning Star from its commencement to the close of his life, and from 1834, for several years was one of its editors. He published several Sermons, and left a full journal of his life and ministry. See Morning Star, Aug. 23, 1876. (J. C. S.)

Cavers, WALTER, A. M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1692; was called to the living at Fala in 1697, and ordained; and died Jan. 3, 1742, aged about seventy years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 279.

Cavetto, Theatre of Marcellus, Rome.

a circle, used in the Grecian and other styles of architecture. See COLUMN.

Caviathan (Kaviaḏav), one of the twelve "maternal" angels in the system of Justinus (Hippol. Ref. v, 26). Harvey conjectures that we should read Caulacau, but, if any correction be necessary, a simpler change is Schneidewin's conjecture, Levia-than.

Cavin, James M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Miami County, O., June, 1824. He experienced religion in the winter of 1842-43; was educated at the Ohio Wesleyan University; received license to preach in 1850, and entered the Ohio Conference, wherein he served the Church until his decease, May 19, 1855. Mr. Cavin was grave and gentlemanly in deportment, deep in piety, and exemplary in life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1855, p. 639.

Cavin, Samuel, a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Ireland. He was sent by Donegal Presbytery, Nov. 16, 1737, to Conecocheague, Md., and came to Canogogig in 1739. After laboring some time in the Highlands of New York, he was called, May 26, 1743, to Goodwill, Ga. The remainder of his life was spent in itinerating in Virginia and filling vacancies. He died Nov. 9, 1750. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in America, 1857.

Caw, John, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1795, presented to the living at Bothkennar in 1796, and ordained, and died Dec. 4, 1847, aged eighty-two years. See Fusti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 695.

Cawches, KATHARINE, an English martyr, was judged a heretic, and burned, with her two daughters, on the isle of Guernsey, in 1556. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 228.

Cawdrey, DANIEL, an English nonconforming divine, was educated at Peter-house, Cambridge, and ejected from his living of Dilling, in Northamptonshire. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly of divines, and wrote, besides sermons and treatises, several violent philippics against the Established Church. He died in 1664.

Cawrdaf, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was king of Brecknockshire, and whenever he went to battle the whole population of the country attended his summons (see Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 270; Williams, Tolo Manuscripts, p. 497).

Cawthorn, JAMES, an English clergyman and poet, was born at Sheffield, Nov. 4, 1719. He was educated at the grammar-schools of Sheffield and Kirkby Lonsdale, and entered Clare Hall, Cambridge, in 1738. After leaving Cambridge he went to London, where he became assistant in an academy. About this time he took orders, and in 1743 was elected master of Tunbridge school. He was killed by a fall from his horse, April 15, 1761. His principal works are, The Perjured Lover (1736);—Abelard to Eloise (1746). An edition of his Poems appeared in 1771. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Caxes, Eugenio, a Spanish painter, the son and scholar of Patricio, was born at Madrid in 1577. In the monastery of St. Augustin Calzada, at Madrid, is a fine picture of St. Joachim and St. Anna: in the Church of St. Martin are his two pictures of The Nativity and

The Adoration of the Magi. All his other works were destroyed by fire. He died in 1642. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caxes, Patricio, an Italian architect and painter, was born at Arezzo or Florence about the middle of the 16th century. Little is known of his early history, but he attained sufficient eminence to be invited to Spain by Philip II. He was appointed to decorate the Queen's Gallery at the Prado, and painted there The Chastity of Joseph. He translated into Spanish the Treatise on Architecture, by Vignole (1593). See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cayet (Lat. Cajetanus). See CAJET.

Cayley, Lady, the widow of Sir Thomas Cayley, Bart., was one of the most eminent and devoted Christians known in the annals of Methodism. She was converted at the age of fifty-two, at Brompton, where she resided, in the Scarboro' circuit, and joined the Methodist society, of which she continued a most faithful member until her death, July 30, 1828, aged eighty. She was the means of reintroducing Methodist preaching in Brompton; through her exertions a chapel was built, and every poor and neglected family in the neighborhood shared her visits and personal labors. Humility, devotion, and an unceasing desire to do good characterized all her spiritual life. She was strongly attached to the doctrine and discipline of the Methodists. See Wesl. Meth. Mag. 1830, p. 1; Smith, Hist. of Wesl. Methodism, ii, 384-386.

Caylus, DANIEL CHARLES GABRIEL DE Pestels de Lévis de Tubières de, a French prelate, was born at Paris, April 20, 1669. After having been admitted doctor at the Sorbonne, he was appointed one of the king's almoners, under the auspices of Madame de Maintenon, next grand-vicar of cardinal Noailles, and obtained, in 1704, the bishopric of Auxerre. In that city he exhibited his charity during the very severe winter of 1709. He was one of the opponents of the bull Unigenitus, and also one of the twelve bishops who protested against the deposition of Soanen and against the declaration of 1730. Caylus died at Rennes, April 3, 1754. His works were published in 10 vols., from 1750 to 1752. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cayman. See CAEMHAN.

Cayot, AUGUSTIN, a reputable French sculptor, was born at Paris in 1667, and studied under Le Hongre. He gained the grand prize of the Royal Academy, and was sent to Rome, where he became an assistant to Van Cleve. Among other works, he executed the two angels in bronze, for the grand altar of the Church of Notre Dame at Paris. He died in 1722. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Caytan, LOUIS ALBERT, a Belgian writer, was born at Roulers in 1742. In 1774 he became pastor at Notre Dame, in Bruges; in 1790 he was made canon of the city and censor of books. After this he became one of the three secretaries of the general vicariate of the bishopric of Bruges, and was associated with the vicariate in 1798. He remained general vicar until 1802, which is the date of the reunion of the two dioceses of Gand and of Bruges. At the close of the 18th century Caytan was still firm and energetic in the midst of the agitations caused by the French Revolution, and he even suffered imprisonment in consequence. He died in 1813, in the hospital for strangers. In a life so full of agitation, Caytan still found the calmness to write and publish several historical and religious books. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cazales, EDMOND DE, a French abbot, was born at Grenade-sur-Garonne in 1804. He studied law, but in 1829 abandoned his profession and betook himself to the study of theology. In 1835 he was made professor at Louvain, and in 1843 took holy orders. In 1845 he was made head of the seminary at Nîmes, and in 1848 vicar-general and superior of the large seminary at Montauban. He died at Rennes in 1876, leaving Étude Historique et Critique de l'Allemagne Contemporaine (Paris, 1853):—Nos Maux et Leurs Remèdes (1875). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Cazes, Jean de, a French martyr, was condemned because he visited Arnold Moniere, a heretic, in prison. After his examination he was sentenced to be burned. When the time came for his martyrdom, he was dragged through the streets to the place of execution, and bound to the stake, where he made full confession of his faith, and gave many earnest exhortations to the people. During his imprisonment he bore his sufferings with great patience, and constantly urged the people to trust in God. Trumpets were sounded to prevent those present from hearing his words. He was burned at Bordeaux in 1556. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 425.

Cazes, Pierre Jacques, an eminent French painter, was born in Paris in 1676, and studied under Houasse, and subsequently in the school of Bon Boullogne. He obtained the grand prize at the academy in 1699, and in 1704 was elected a royal academician. There are many of his works to be seen at Paris, in the Church of Notre Dame, in the college of the Jesuits, at the House of Charity, etc. At St. Germain-des-Près he represented the lives of St. Germain and St. Vincent. A Holy Family at St. Louis de Versailles is very much admired. He died in Paris, June 25, 1754. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Cazier, Mathias, a Congregational minister, graduated at Princeton College, and immediately became pastor of a church in Pelham, Mass. In August, 1799, he removed to Connecticut, and was installed pastor of a church in South Britain, where he labored till January, 1804. In May of that year he supplied Salem Church, in the town of Waterbury. He died in 1837.

Cea, Didacus de, a Spanish theologian of the order of Franciscans, was a native of Aqeda. He was made general commissary of the Franciscans at Rome, and died in the monastery of Ara Coeli in 1640, leaving, Archeologia Sacra Principum Apostolorum Petri et Pauli (Rome, 1636, 4to):—Theaurus Terræ Sanctæ, etc. (ibid. 1639, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ceadda, the eighth bishop of Hereford, between 758 and 777, the successor of Hecca and the predecessor of Aldberht.

Ceadda (or Chadd) of York. See CHAD.

Cealchythe, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Celchythum, or Calchuthense). This was a place in Mercia. Bishop Gibson suggests that it may be the same with Kelchelth, in Lancashire, on the borders of Cheshire. It is generally thought to be Chelsea, originally Chelchyth. Several councils were held there:

I. In 785 or 787, by Gregory (or George), bishop of Ostia (the legate of pope Adrian I), who, in his letter to the pope, declares that Alfwald, the king, and Eanbald, the archbishop of York, with all the bishops and abbots of the country, were present, besides the senators, dukes, and people of the land. Its object was to renew the "antiquam amicitiam" between Rome and England, and to affirm "the Catholic faith" and the six œcumenical councils. But it also appears to have been made the occasion of preparing the way for the erecting of Lichfield into an archbishopric independent of Canterbury, which actually took place in 788. Twenty canons were published, regulating the administration of baptism, visitations of bishops, their care of canons, election of abbots, etc., ordination of priests and deacons, celebration of mass, election of, and government by, kings, marriage, tithes, etc.

A companion council was held in Northumbria (Haddan and Stubbs, Concil. iii, 444).

II. Held in 789, called "Pontificale Concilium;" made several grants still extant.

III. In 793, at which a grant was made to St. Alban's.

IV. In 799, at which a cause was adjudicated between king Kenulf and the bishop of Selsea.

V. Held July 26, 816, Wulfred, archbishop of Canterbury, presiding. Besides Kenulf, king of the Mercians, and his lords, there were present twelve bishops, among whom were those of Rochester, Selsea, Hereford, Lindisfarne, and London. Many abbots, priests, and deacons also attended. Eleven canons were published, relating to the faith, consecration of churches, giving to every bishop the power to select his own abbots, etc., forbidding them to diminish the estates of their churches, etc.

Ceb (Cebus, Cepus, or Cephus) was a monster worshipped at Memphis, supposed to have been a satyr, or ape.

Ceccarini, Sebastiano, a historical painter of Urbino, was born about the year 1700. He studied under Augustino Castellacci, and practiced afterwards at Rome. His best productions are at Favo, where he resided. Among them are his St. Lucia, at the church of the Augustines, and several sacred subjects in the palaces. He died about the year 1780.

Cecchi, Giovanni Battista, a Florentine engraver, was born about 1748, and engraved a number of works, among which are the following: The Location of St. Andrew to the Apostleship; The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence; The Martyrdom of St. Vitalis; The Stoning of Stephen; The Entombing of Christ. He was living in 1812.

Cecil, Richard, an English Congregational minister, was born in London, Jan. 13, 1799. At the age of fourteen he was converted, and at sixteen entered Rotherham College. He began his ministerial work at Whitehaven, and afterwards removed to Harpenden, near St. Alban's. In 1824 he became pastor of St. James Street Chapel, Nottingham. After remaining there five years, he labored nine years at Turvey as preacher, also as tutor for the London Missionary Society, and nine years at Ongar; then he returned to Turvey, and died there Jan. 30, 1863. See (Lond.) Cong. Yearbook, 1864, p. 200.

Cecropius was the name of two early Christian bishops:

1. OF NICOMEDIA, in Bithynia, a Semi-arian, who was transferred from Laodicea by Constantius in 351. Athanasius (Contra Arian, p. 290) charges him with having secured his elevation by his calumnies and plots against the orthodox. In the year of his appointment to Nicomedia he attended the synod at Sirmium, and took part in the deposition of Photinus (Athan. Epist. ad Solit. p. 800). Cecropius was one of the bishops who attended the consecration of the church erected at Ancyra, in 358, by Basil, to whom a letter was addressed by George of Laodicea, representing the danger the faith was exposed to in consequence of the recognition of Aëtius and his disciples at Antioch by Eudoxius, and urging them to take bold measures for their deposition (Sozomen, II. E. iv, 13). A deputation was accordingly sent to Constantius, who ordered that Aëtius and some of his followers should be brought before Cecropius to answer to the charges alleged against them (ibid. iv, 24). Cecropius perished in the earthquake which devastated Nicomedia in 358, and prevented the proposed council from being held there.

2. OF SEBASTOPOLIS, took a leading part in the Council of Chalcedon in 451. At the second session, Oct. 10, Cecropius strenuously opposed the formation of any new definition of the faith, and required that the Nicene creed and the letter of pope Leo to Flavian should be read for the acceptance of the assembled fathers. He was one of the deputation sent to serve the second citation on Dioscorus, and refused to accept his plea of illness as a reason for declining to attend. At the fifth session he vehemently urged that all present should sign the definition of faith then presented, or leave the council (Labbe, Concil. iv, 338 sq.).

Cedda (or Cedd), an English bishop, was a native of Northumbria, and brother of Chad (q. v.). In 653 Peada, ruler of the Middle-Angles, became a Christian, and took home with him, in order to convert his people, four priests, of whom Cedda was one. About the same time Sigberht, king of Essex, also embraced Christianity, and allowed Cedda to visit that kingdom. In consequence the latter was ordained, by Finan, bishop of Lindisfarne, about 654. He afterwards became abbot of Læstingen (Lastingham). In 664 Cedda was present at the Synod of Streneshaleh (Whitby), and died shortly after. Almost everything that we know about Cedda is in Bede, H. E. iii, c. xxi-xxiii. Cedda's day in the calendar is Jan. 7.

Ceddau. See CATAU.

Cedmon. See CÆDMON.

Cedol, an early Welsh saint, of uncertain date, was patron of the chapel of Pentir, otherwise Llangedol, subject to Bangor, in Carnarvonshire. He is commemorated on November 1 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 306).

Cedonius, Saint and Confessor, was bishop of Aix, in Provence. His name occurs in the Martyrologium Gallicanum and in the Breviary of Aix; but his date and acts are quite uncertain. He is otherwise called Sidonius (Acta Sanctorum, Aug. iv, 591).

Cedwyn, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was the reputed patron of Llangedwyn, a chapel under Llanrhaiadr, in Montgomeryshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 280).

Ceidio AR CAW, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was patron of Rhodwydd Geidio, subject to Llantrisant, in Anglesey, and of Ceidio, in Carnarvonshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 227).

Ceiling is the under covering of a roof, floor, etc., concealing the timbers from the room below; now usually formed of plaster, but formerly most commonly of boarding; also the under surface of the vaulting in vaulted rooms and buildings. During the Middle Ages, the ceilings were generally enriched with gilding and coloring of the most brilliant kind, traces of which may often still be found in churches, though in a faded and dilapidated condition. Plaster and wood ceilings under roofs are often made flat, as at Peterborough Cathedral and St. Alban's Abbey, both of which are Norman with old-style painting, but they frequently follow the line of the timbers of the roof, which are sometimes arranged so as to give the shape of a barrel-vault, especially in Early English and Decorated work.

In the Perpendicular style they are more common than in any other, and are usually either flat or canted, and divided by ribs into square panels. See RIE.

The ceiling in churches, immediately over the altar, and occasionally also that over the roodloft, is sometimes richly ornamented, while the remainder is plain, as at Ilfracombe, Devon. This custom continued as late as to the time of Charles II.

Ceinwen, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was patron of Llanginwen and of Cerrig Ceinwen, in Anglesey. He is commemorated on Oct. 8 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 151).

Ceitho, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was the presumed founder of Llangeitho, in Cardiganshire. He is commemorated on Aug. 5 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 213).

Celadion succeeded Marcus II, as bishop of Alexandria, in 153. He was succeeded by Agrippinus in 168. (Euseb. H. E. iv, 11; Chron. apud Hieron. p. 2171).

Celano, THOMAS A. See DIES IRÆ.

Celantia was a noble Roman matron, a letter to whom is included among those of St. Jerome (Epist. 148, ed. Vall.), though it is probably by some other hand. The letter is full of moderate councils as to asceticism, and blames her for taking a vow of continence without her husband's consent.

Celbes. See ACEMBES.

Celebrant (or celebrating priest) is the priest who makes the oblation and consecrates the holy eucharist; so called to distinguish him from the assisting priests or deacons.

Cele-Christ, bishop of Cill-Cele-Christ, in Uidunchadha, of Fotharta in Leinster, was a native of Ulster, being son of Eochaidh and brother of Comgall. He left his native province, and, going to the west of Leinster, built a church in the district called Hy-Donchadha, which was afterwards known as Cill-Cele-Chriost. There he wished to flee from all earthly employment and devote himself to heavenly contemplation; but honor pursued him, and "invitus ad pontificalis dignitatis apicem rapitur." With some others he went on a pilgrimage to Rome, and died in 722, some time after his return. He is venerated March 31 (see Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii, 162; Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, p. 82).

Cele-Clerech, bishop and martyr, commemorated July 8, is given in the Mart. Doneg. as martyred along with Ædh and Tadhá at Würzburg, in Franconia. He is probably the same as CILIAN.

Cele-Peadair (servant of Peter) was abbot of Armagh, and the Four Masters gave his obit A.D. 757. He was a native of Ui-Breasail-Macha (now Clan-brasil, County Armagh), and succeeded bishop Congus at Armagh, in the year 750, as abbot and bishop.

Celedel. See COLIDEL.

Celedonius, martyr at Leon, in Spain, is commemorated March 3, in the Ancient Roman Martyrology.

Celenena, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Celenense), was held A.D. 447 in a small place close to Lugo, in Galicia, against the Priscillianists. It was an appendage to the first Council of Toledo. See Labbe, Concil. iii, 1466.

Celer, (1) proconsul of Africa A.D. 429, is addressed by Augustine (Epist. 56, 57, or 237, 210) as a Donatist. He was anxious to know if the African Donatists had any good reason for severing themselves from the Catholics. (2) Martyr of the primitive Welsh Church, was patron of Llangeler, in Carmarthenshire.

Celerina, (1) a martyr in Africa, under Decius, is commemorated with Celerinus, Feb. 3, in the Jerusalem and Roman martyrologies. (2) The deaconess to whom Theodoret wrote his Epist. 101.

Celerinus, (1) a confessor at Rome, was tortured, apparently in the presence of Decius himself. He writes in agony of mind to Lucianus (q. v.), the Carthaginian confessor, to beg a libellus for his two sisters—Numeria and Candida—the latter of whom had sacrificed; and, to avoid sacrificing the former, called also Etecusa, "paid money." The Celerinus whom Cyprinus ordained in his retirement, near Carthage, in December, 250 (Epist. 37 and 39), must be the same person; for he comes from Rome, and from the famous group of confessors—Moyses, Maximus, etc. He belonged to a family of martyrs—his grandmother, Celerina, and two uncles, Laurentinus and Ignatius, having died by martyrdom. In the Carthaginian Calendar he is commemorated Feb. 3 as deacon confessor. Again, the Celerinus mentioned in Cornelius's letter to Fabius, bishop of Antioch, must be the same (Euseb. H. E. v, 43). (2) Father of Ageruchia (q. v.). See Jerome, Epist. 123, ed. Vall.

Celesti, Cavaliere ANDREA, a Venetian painter, was born in 1637, and studied under Ponzone. His best historical works are in the Church of the Ascension, at Venice, of which the most esteemed is an Adoration of the Magi; and in the ducal palace a picture of a subject from the Old Test. He died in 1706. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Celfrithus. See CEOLFRID.

Celi, PLACIDO, an Italian painter, was a native of Messina, and studied under Augustino Scilla. He executed some works for the churches of Messina, and some for the churches dell' Anima and Transpontina, at Rome. He died at Messina in 1710.

Celichius, ANDREAS, a Lutheran theologian, who died in 1699 while superintendent at Güstrov, was one of the signers of the Formula Concordiæ, and published, Postilla super Evangel. Domin.: — Dias. de Studio Linguae Sanctæ: — Emblemata Catecheseos Christianæ in Versibus Elegiacis. See Thomas, Analecta Güstroviensis; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Célideine, a French prelate, was bishop of Besançon after Léonce, about 443. Hilary, bishop of Arles, had deposed him for various offences, among others, for having married a widow and having assisted at a service before being ordained; but Célideine appealed to pope Leo I, who ordered him to be re-established in his see. This is the first time that a bishop made an appeal to a pope; but Hilary did not acquiesce in the decision, and Célideine remained deposed. It is supposed that Célideine perished in 451, during the capture of Besançon by Attila. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Celin. See CAOLIN.

Celio, Cavaliere GASPARO, a Roman painter, was born in 1571, and studied under Nicolo Circignani. He painted several works for the Roman churches; the best are St. Michael Discomfiting the Fallen Spirits, in San Giovanni Laterano; St. Francis Receiving the Stigmata, in the Mendicante, and The Israelites Crossing the Red Sea; in the gallery of the Palazzo Mattei. Celio died in 1640.

Cell, in ecclesiastical usage denotes (1) a small apartment; (2) the small dwelling of a hermit or a Carthusian; that of the latter contained a bedroom, dayroom, and study; (3) a cubiculum, or partitioned sleeping-room in a dormitory.

CELL, i. e. OBEDIENCE, or ABBATIAL; was a dependent religious house founded on an abbey estate, under the jurisdiction of the abbot of the mother Church. About the middle of the 11th century, owing to the creation of a new dignity, the prior, in the Abbey of Clugni, these establishments received the designation of priories.

Cell, JEREMIAH, a Baptist minister, was born in Western Pennsylvania, April 13, 1819. He joined a Presbyterian Church in Ohio in 1839, and a Baptist Church in 1846. Soon after, he began to preach. He studied for a time at Covington, Ky., preaching meanwhile for the Church in Newport. Subsequently he served churches in Aurora, Ind., two years; Ebenezer, eight years; Momenie, Ill., two years; Galesburg, Mich., three years; a second time in Aurora, then

Greensboro, Ind., from 1864 to 1866; recalled to Galesburg, then went to Centralia, Ill., six years; returned to Greensboro in the spring of 1874, in which year he died. He commanded the respect, esteem, and confidence of all. See Min. of Ill. Anniversaries, 1874, p. 8 (J. C. S.)

Cella (or Cella Memoriarum), was a small memorial chapel erected in a sepulchral area over the tomb of a deceased person, in which at stated times, especially the anniversary of his decease, friends and dependents assembled to celebrate an agape, and partake of a banquet in his honor. Sepulchral buildings of this character were common both to heathens and Christians. Christianity simply inherited them, and purged them of licentious or idolatrous taint.

Directions for the erection of a building bearing the same title, and devoted to a similar purpose, by a pagan, are given in a very curious will, once engraved on a tomb at Langres, a copy of a portion of which has been discovered in the binding of a MS. of the 10th century in the library at Basle.

These cellæ were halls for memorial banquets. The Christians were essentially men of their country and their age, following in all things lawful the customs of the time and place in which their lot was cast. Rejecting the abuses arising from the license of pagan morals, there was nothing in itself to take exception at in the funeral feast. Indeed, the primitive "love-feasts" were often nothing more than banquets held in cellæ at the tombs of the faithful, the expenses of which, in the case of the poorer members, were provided out of the church-chest. Pictorial representations of banquets of this nature are found in the catacombs. These cellæ also formed oratories where prayers were offered over the remains of the departed. The name was applied only to buildings erected above the ground, those below being known as CUBICULA (q. v.).

Cella and Cellula were employed at a later time for sepulchral chapels built along the side walls of a church, and in this sense the terms are used by Paulinus of Nola.

Cellach (Celian, or Kellach), a name derived from Ceall, or Cill, "a cell," and borne by thirty-three saints between 657 and 1148; but few of them have much bearing on history, or are distinctly identifiable.

1. Commemorated April 1. Seems to be the son of Sarguse, anchorite, abbot, and bishop of Armagh, in the end of the 9th century. This is likewise the day of Ceallach, abbot of Iona. Ceallach, son of Conghal, was abbot of Hy, A.D. 802-815, and during his presidency the monastery of Kells, in Meath, was founded, or re-organized after its original foundation by St. Columba, and was made the chief station of the Columbian order, on account of the danger and sufferings to which the community at Iona was exposed from the attacks of the Northmen. There is mention also of a Ceallach, son of Conmach, who was blind, deaf, and lame.

2. Deacon in Glendaloch in Ui-Mail. Colgan (Tr. Thaum. p. 510, c. 9) says that St. Kellach, son of Sarac, abbot of Fothan (now Fathan, County Donegal), was successor of Mura; died, according to the Four Masters, A.D. 657, and was venerated on October 7. These may have been placed upon the same day, but can hardly be the same person.

Cellah. See CEOLLACH.

Cellanus was a native of Ireland, and a monk in France, in the monastery where the uncorrupted body of St. Furseus rested, at Peronne. He wrote to Aldhelm begging some of his discourses, and received from him a favorable reply.

Cellarage is an ecclesiastical name for the store-chambers of the cellar or house-steward, such as were formed under the refectory at Kirkham and Lewes; under the guest-hall at Chester; but more usually below the dormitory. It commonly was divided longitudinally into two alleys by a range of pillars, and laterally by wooden screens, into separate rooms. At Fountains one enormous range on the western side of the cloister was filled with wool, with which the Cistercians supplied the market at the convent. At Chester, a similar vaulted space was stocked with fish, which the abbey boats brought up the Dee. At Durham, it was divided into various apartments, and devoted to many uses. The substructure of the refectory contained the food, and that of the dormitory the materials for furniture and clothing. At Canterbury, in the western range of vaults were the beer and wine cellars; and at the north end, as at the Charter-house, the turn remains in the wall—an oblique opening through which the cup of wine asked for by a weary monk was passed to him. At Battle Abbey two magnificent specimens remain; one under the guest-house, and the other on the west side of the cloisters, as at Beaulieu, where a wall divides it from the cloisters.

Cellarius, Andreas, a Protestant theologian of Germany, born at Rotenburg, on the Neckar, in 1503; was pastor at Wildberg, in Württemberg, and died Sept. 18, 1562, leaving Von der Haltung eines Concilii: — Von Vereinigung der Christlichen Religionen. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cellarius, Balthasar, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 10, 1614, at Rothleben, and studied at Jena, Wittenberg, and Helmstadt. He died Sept. 15, 1671, being doctor and professor of theology of Helmstadt and abbot of Marienthal, and leaving Examen Controversiarum Ecclesiasticarum Augustana Confessionis: — Epitome Theologiæ Philosophicæ: — De Natura Theologiæ. See Witte, Memorie Theologorum; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Cellarius, Christopher, a German theologian, was born Nov. 22, 1638, at Smalcald. He studied at Jena and Giessen; was in 1667 professor of Hebrew at Weissenfels, in 1673 rector at Weimar, in 1676 at Zeitz, and in 1688 at Merseburg. In 1693 he was appointed professor of history at Halle, and died June 4, 1707. He wrote, among many other works, Rabbinismus (Giessen, 1681, also in Reland's Anal. Rab., Utrecht, 1702): Grammatica Hebraica (ibid. 1681, 1684): De Lingue Sanctæ Proprietatibus (3d ed. 1679): De Gemino Judæorum Messia, (Weissenfels, 1668): Sciographia Philologiæ (Zeitz, 1678). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 150; Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Handbuch, p. 33; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Cellarius (Keller, or Kellner), Johannes, a German theologian, was born at Kundstadt in 1496, and died at Dresden, April 21, 1542, where he was the first Lutheran superintendent. He wrote, Isagogicon in Hebr. Literas (Hagenoe, 1518): Tabule Declinationum et Conjugationum Hebr. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Handbuch, p. 33; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Cellarius, Ludwig Friedrich, a German theologian, was born Nov. 25, 1745, at Quitteksdorf, and died at Rudolstadt, May 22, 1818, while pastor primarius and member of consistory. He wrote, De Paulo Apostolo, etc. (Wittenberg, 1776): De Sila Viro Apostolico (ibid. 1773). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 568, 571. (B. P.)

Cellars, J. V., a Presbyterian minister, was a graduate of Washington and Jefferson College, and also of the Western Theological Seminary. On completing his education, he was called to the pastorate of the Providence Missionary Church in Allegheny, Pa. He was for a time professor of Hebrew and Oriental literature in the seminary. He retired on account of failing health, and died at Allegheny, Sept. 20, 1872. See Presbyterian, Oct. 12, 1872. (W. P. S.)

Celle, Pierre de, a French prelate of the 12th century, was born in Champagne, and studied at Paris, in the convent of St. Martin-des-Champs. He was made abbé of La Celle about 1150, and of St. Remi, at Rheims, in 1162. His piety, science, lively spirit, good judgment, and zeal gave him the friendship of the greatest men of the Church. He succeeded John of Salisbury as bishop of Chartres in 1180, and occupied that see until his death in 1187. Among his writings may be cited, Mosaici Tabernaculi Mystica Expositio (Paris, 1600, 4to): —De Conscientia, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cellérier, Jacob Elisée, a French theologian, son of Jean, was born at Satigny, Dec. 12, 1785. He studied at Geneva, was in 1808 ordained to the ministry, and for some time assisted, and finally succeeded, his father in the ministry. In 1816 he was appointed professor of Hebrew and Biblical literature at Geneva, and occupied that chair till 1854. He died in 1862, leaving Grammaire Hébraïque, de W. Gesenius (the first Hebrew grammar in French, 1820): —Analyse Raisonnée de l'Ouvrage Intitulé: Einleitung in die Schriften des Neuen Testaments, de J. L. Hug (1823): —De l'Origine de l'Ancien Testament (1826): —De l'Origine du Nouveau Testament (1829): —Introduction à l'Ancien Testament (1832): —La Législation Mosaïque (1837, 2 vols.): —L'Épître de Saint-Jacques (1850): —Manuel d'Herméneutique (1852):—and many essays in different periodicals. See Th. Heyer, Notice sur le Professeur J. E. Cellérier (Geneva, 1863); Choisy, Le Professeur Cellérier (in the Chrétien Évangélique, 1863); Bouvier, in Lichtenberger's Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 151. (B. P.)

Cellérier, Jean Isaac Samuel, a French theologian, was born at Crans, near Nyon, Switzerland, in 1758. He studied at Geneva, where he was ordained in 1776. Having spent a few years in travelling, he returned to his native country, and was called in 1783 as pastor to Satigny, where he labored for thirty-one years. In 1814 he resigned his pastorate on account of feeble health, and spent the remainder of his life at Geneva, where he died in 1844. He wrote more than four hundred and twenty sermons, of which one hundred and forty-one were published during his lifetime, and twenty-three after his death. The others are still in manuscript in the library belonging to the pastors' association of Geneva. See Coulin, in Lichtenberger's Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 219. (B. P.)

Cellitæ were a class of monks midway between hermits and cenobites. Strictly speaking, they were the "anchorites," so called because they withdrew or retired from the cenobia, wherein the monks dwelt together, to small cells in the immediate vicinity. On festivals the cellitæ repaired to the church of the monastery, and thus, being still semi-attached to the community, they differed from the "hermits," who were independent of control. As preferring the more complete privacy and quiet of these cells to living in common, they were sometimes called hesychastæ. But the cells of the cellitæ, properly so called, resembled rather a "laura" in Egypt and Palestine, each laura being a quasi-cenobitic cluster of cells, forming a community to which, in the earlier days of monasticism, the abbot's will was in place of a written rule. The first of these lauræ is said to have been founded by St. Chariton, about the middle of the 4th century, near the Dead Sea. Other famous lauræ were those of St. Euthymius, near Jerusalem, in the next century, and of St. Sabas, near the Jordan. Each cell had a small garden or vineyard, in which the monk could occupy himself at pleasure. But sometimes the cellitæ was a monk with aspirations after more than ordinary self-denial. Thus it was a custom at Vienna, in the 6th century, for some monk, selected as pre-eminent in sanctity, to be immured in a solitary cell, as an intercessor for the people.

A strict rule for cellitæ was drawn up in the 9th century. Their cells were to be near the monastery, either standing apart one from another, or communicating only by a window. The cellitæ were to be supported by their own work or by alms; they might be either clergy or laymen. If professed monks, they were to wear the dress of the order; if not, a cape as a badge. None were to be admitted among the cellitæ except by the bishop or the abbot, nor without a novitiate. They were to have their own chapel for mass; and a window in the wall of the church, through which they might "assist" at the services, and receive the confessions of penitents. A seal was to be set by the bishop on the door of each cell, never to be broken, except in urgent sickness, for the necessary medical and spiritual comfort.

Cellor, (1) the same with CELER (2); (2) said to have been fifth bishop of Toul; (3) bishop, who signs first at the Council of Valencia, A.D. 524; (4) bishop of Valencia, at the Council of Toledo, A.D. 589.

Cellot, LOUIS, a French theologian and historian, of the Jesuit order, was born at Paris in 1588. He was successively rector of the colleges of Rouen and of La Flèche, afterwards provincial. The society charged him with the defence of the privileges of the regulars against the rights of the pastors. He died in Paris, Oct. 12, 1658, leaving De Hierarchia et Hierarchiis (Rouen, 1641, fol.); a work censured by the Sorbonne, and put into the Index at Rome:—Horæm Subcisivæ (Paris, 1648, 4to, which is a response to the treatise of Hallier, entitled De Hierarchia Ecclesiastica):—Historia Gothescalcii (ibid. 1655, fol.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cellulanus is a term supposed to be equivalent to cellita. It means a monk sharing the same cell with another. Sidonius Apollinaris (ix, Epist. 3, ad Faust.) uses it for the Lerinensian monks.

Cellulârii is a name sometimes given to monks, from their living in cells.

Celrêdus (Selredus, or Selfridus), abbot of Medeshamstede (afterwards Peterborough), was brother of Siward, abbot of Croyland, A.D. 806.

Celsa, A.D. 632, succeeded Rusticula as abbess of the nunnery founded by Cæsarius of Arles.

Celsinus, a writer, probably a Platonist, from whom Augustine quotes (Contra Academ. 11, ii [5], vol. i, 921).

Celsus was the name of several early Christians:

1. Fifth bishop of Treves, who died, it is said, in 141. His body was discovered in 977, and miracles are reported to have been wrought by it, but his history is uncertain (Acta Sanctorum, Feb. iii, 393).

2. Bishop of Iconium, who allowed a layman named Paulinus to preach, as Demetrius is informed by Alexander (Euseb. H. E. vi, 19).

3. A boy, otherwise called Hircitallus, son of the præfect Marcianus and Marcionilla, converted by St. Julian's constancy under his tortures at Antioch, was imprisoned with him, converted his own mother, and was martyred, together with her and seven brethren, on the Feast of the Epiphany—perhaps in A.D. 309.

4. A messenger of Paulinus of Nola to Augustine, who writes by him his eightieth (65th) epistle, in a hurry, as Celsus came late at night to tell Augustine he sailed early in the morning. The date is fixed at A.D. 405.

5. Abbot at the Council of Rouen which gave privileges to the abbey of Fontenelles, A.D. 682.

6. Saint and confessor, of Limoges. Certain relics of this saint are preserved in St. Stephen's cathedral at Limoges, but his history and date are unknown (Acta Sanctorum, Aug. ii, 191).

Celsus, MINUS (Minos Celso or Minio Celsi), an Italian of Sienna, who joined the Protestant Church, and went to Basle, where he was employed as corrector of the press, and where he died in the latter part of the 16th century, is the author of Testamentum Novum Latine et Gallice (Basle, 1572). After his death there were published his In Hæreticis Coercendis Quatuor Progreſſi Liceat Disputatio (1577):—De Hæreticis Capitali Supplicio non Afficiendis (1584). See Schellhorn, Dissertatio Epistolæ de Mino Celso Senensi (Ulm, 1748); Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 487; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.).

Celynin, a Welsh saint of the 7th century, was patron of Llangelynin, in Merionethshire: commemorated on November 20 (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 302).

Cemetery. The early Christians used the subterranean vaults or excavations beneath the hills in the neighborhood of Rome chiefly for the purpose of burial. At the entrance, chapels were erected, and hence the cemetery-chapel was spoken of under the name of cœmeterium. The vaults containing the coffins were called catacombs, and, besides being used as burial-places, were possibly, during times of persecution, though rarely, used by the early Christians for worship. In after-times, when persecution ceased, access to them was frequent, in consequence of so many saints and martyrs reposing there, and prayers at their tombs were considered more efficacious than elsewhere. It is most probable that this gave rise to the introduction of crypts beneath our own churches, where saints only were buried, or to which their remains were moved sometimes years after their burial. At their tombs the faithful of all ages have worshipped as at an altar. In mediæval times the cemetery for the faithful was simply the ground adjoining the church, which was enclosed as church-yards are now, and was often called Paradise. At times, as at Canterbury to A.D. 750, it was forbidden to bury within towns, and in that case a cemetery was provided outside the town, with its church or chapel, as in our own times.—Parker, Gloss. of Architect. s. v.

Tertullian calls the burying-place adjoining a church an area, when used for religious meetings. The enormous Campo Santo, built between 1218 and 1283, by John of Pisa, is the most remarkable in Europe, forming a great cloistered quadrangle. The burial-place of unbaptized infants was called the Cemetery of the Innocents. In continental cemeteries, and commonly in the north of France, a light—the dead man's lantern—burned in a pharos, or tower, to mark the resting-place of the dead; one, of the 13th century, remains at Fountevault; and it is not improbable that, in England, in many cases a low side-window contained a lantern, or lych-light, for the same purpose. There are sometimes two churches within one churchyard, as at Altringham, Evesham, Willingale, Cockerington, Hackford, Reepham, and Gillingham; as formerly also at Fulbourne, Trimley, and Staunton. The monastic cemetery was usually on the south side, and the laymen's yard on the north of the presbytery, in England, but in France eastward of it; and a light burning at night gave light both to the crypt and this garth. At Durham, after dinner, the monks, bareheaded, went in procession, daily, to pray around the graves of their departed brethren. At Canterbury, the southern clove was divided into the outer cemetery, for lay persons, and the inner, for ecclesiastics and religious. The cemetery-gate, called at Gloucester and Worcester, until their destruction, the Lych-gate, remains at Ely and St. Augustine's, Canterbury.

Cena is the name of a lady who writes (A.D. 733) to St. Boniface, assuring him of her prayers, and begging his. She rarely sees him, but would gladly serve him or any of his party, should they come into her province. To her place of residence the letter gives no clew (St. Boniface Epist. 34, ed. Würdtwein; in Migne, Patrol. lxxxix, 733).

Cenalis (or Ceneau), ROBERT, a French theologian, was born at Paris. He was successively bishop of Vence, of Riez, and of Avranches. He died in Paris, April 27, 1560. Some of his principal works are, De Vera Mensuram Ponderumque Ratione (Paris, 1532, 1535, 1547, 8vo):—Pro Tuendo Sacro Celabatu (ibid. 1545, 8vo):—De Utriusque Gladii Facultate, etc. (ibid. 1546, 12mo; Leyden, 1558):—De Divortio Matrimonii Mosici (ibid. 1549, 8vo):—Tractatus Impietatis Calvinice (ibid. 1556, 8vo):—Historia Gallica (ibid. 1557, 1581), etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cenannan is the name of an Irish saint, commemorated March 26. On Inishmanan, or the middle Isle of Arran, in Galway Bay, stands the roofless ruins of a small church, built of immense stones, and called Team-pull Ceannanach. St. Cenannan, or Kenanach, is said to have been son of a king of Leinster, and the patron of Ballynakill, in the barony of Ballynahinch, or Connemara (Petrie, Round Towers, p. 188; Colgan, Acta Sanctorum, p. 715).

Cenchreä. The following description of this once important port of Corinth is taken from Lewin's St. Paul, i, 289 sq.

"Cenchrea, at that time, was a thriving town, situate at the south-western corner of the Saronic bay, in a little cove which formed the harbor. Here, as at Corinth, Venus was the presiding deity, and her temple was a conspicuous object to the mariner on the north of the port; while at the southern end of it were the temples of Æsculapius and Isis: and by the side of the stream which ran (and still runs) along the border of the sea from north to south, before discharging its waters, was, according to Pausanias, a bronze statue (Corinth. ii, 9).

Port of Cenchrea as it now lies.

1. Temple of Diana which lay on the road from the Isthmus to Cenchrea, but the exact site is uncertain.
2. Site of the Temple of Venus at the northern end of the port.
3. Probable site of the bronze statue of Neptune holding a trident in one hand and a dolphin in the other.
4. Site of the Temples of Æsculapius and Isis at the southern extremity of the port.
5. Blocks of granite traceable for a length of one hundred paces, and forming anciently the quay of the port for the embarkation and debarkation of goods and passengers. Here Paul must have stepped on board for Ephesus.
6. Site of the city of Cenchrea, which spread itself from the port up the rising ground on the west. The foundations are still traceable over an extensive tract. The name of Cenchrea appears to be derived from the αἰχμή, or millet, then, as now, grown in the vicinity. So Schœnus, the next port, was so called from its αἰχμή, or rushes, and Crommyon, near it, from the αἰχμή, or onions, which abounded there.
7. A circular pool, collecting from one of the numerous springs with which this low ground abounds.
8. A clear running stream flowing from north to south parallel to the sea, and discharging itself at the southern end of the bay.
9. A natural salt-water spring which issues from the rock several feet from the ground. This is the Bath of Helen described by Pausanias, i, 19.
10. A mill.
11. Reservoirs for feeding the mill.

"In 1851, when I was at Kalamaki, on the north-western corner of the Saronic bay, I inquired of the natives if they knew Cenchrea. After some confusion, arising from the pronunciation of the word, they recognised the name, and described it as a creek, where there was a corn-mill and a stream of water flowing from the rock. I crossed in an open boat, and as I approached the spot, the bay appeared to lie between two mountains confronting each other in the dusk, like crouching lions. The elevation on the left was precipitous, and, standing forward into the sea, served as a barrier against the waves from the east; that on the right was approached from the sea by a gentle slope. The pine and olive grew luxuriantly in this direction, the brilliant green of the former and the gray foliage of the latter showing a most striking contrast. The boat was run ashore (for the water was deep to the edge), and we landed on a beach of fine pebbles. Beyond the beach was a row of shrubs covered with red berries, resembling the arbutus. Having passed this, we found ourselves in a triangular plot of ground shut in by the mountains, the sea forming the base of the triangle, and its apex ending in a valley which swept away to the left. A clear and swift stream flowed from north to south, parallel to the sea, as mentioned by Pausanias, 'on the stream alongside of the sea.' Having crossed it, we found about the middle of the area a circular pool resembling a bath, for the purpose of which it was admirably adapted by its size, and the depth and clearness of its waters. A stream was running rapidly from it, betokening the power of the spring by which it was fed. Beyond was another rivulet running towards the sea, and, thinking it must come down the valley, I traced it for a little distance; but all the water was from the springs in the fairy ground we stood upon, and the channel was dry long before we reached the valley. We then turned to the left and traversed the southern side, and here were two small mill-ponds, or reservoirs, enclosed in stone walls, and connected together, with springs in them so abundant, that while a stream flowed from them at one end to supply the mill below, the water poured from the other end into the rivulet which was finding its way to the sea by the side of the mill. At the south-eastern corner of the triangular plot, and near the sea, a stream leaped out of the rock at the height of several feet from the ground. The pool formed by this spring is Pausanias's 'Bath of Helen' (Corinth. ii, 1, 2, 3). It had excavated a channel for itself, and ran into the millstream below the mill. All the waters discharged themselves into the sea at the north-eastern corner of the bay, and all were salt as the sea itself. There was no building in sight but the mill and a small storehouse near it. I had not time to examine the ground to the north, where was the site of the ancient city of Cenchrea. The cove which I had examined was that of Galataki, which was the open port or roadstead of Cenchrea, as opposed to the close or proper port of Cenchrea, which adjoined on the north." (See cut on p. 864.)

Cène, Nicolas, a French martyr, was a physician in Dijon, who visited the prisoners in their filthy cells and sang psalms and did whatever he could to comfort them. He taught the commandments to those who did not already know them. When the time of his examination came he perceived that the judges had intended that, if he would recant, he should be strangled, and if not, he should burn alive and his tongue be cut out; and being content to suffer these torments for his Lord Jesus Christ, he offered his tongue willingly to the hangman to be cut. Then he was drawn out of prison in the dung-cart to the suburbs of St. Germain, where he was burned alive. This occurred at Paris in 1558. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 433.

Cène, Philippe, a French martyr, was an apothecary at Geneva. He was taken at Dijon for objecting to the doctrines of the Church of Rome, and burned in 1557. He went to his death singing psalms. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 426.

Ceneu (Kayne, or Keyna) is the name of several Welsh saints:

1. A recluse of Keynsham, commemorated Oct. 8, whose memory is greatly honored on both sides of the Severn, is said to have been the third daughter of Brychan, of Brycheiniog; but it is more probable that she was either the granddaughter of this Brychan, or the daughter of another, who lived at a later period. According to the legend, in her youth she took up her abode in a wood or desert place near Avon, where the abundance of serpents made the place uninhabitable. But having by prayer performed the miracle of changing the serpents into stones, as is still related of her in that district, she remained for many years where Keyn-sham now stands, and in her old age returned to Brecknock at the request of her nephew, St. Cadoc. There she died in the 5th or beginning of the 6th century, but the place of her interment is unknown. Her name is perpetuated at St. Keyne, a parish in Cornwall, and at Keynsham, in Somerset.

2. Son of Coel, a Welsh saint of the 4th century.

3. Bishop of St. David's in the 6th century, founder of a church named Llangenen, once existing in Pembrokeshire, all traces of the situation of which were obliterated by the Flemings who settled in that county. He was the third bishop, according to one text of Giraldus Cambrensis; but, according to another, he is absent from the list.

Cengille (Cengilleus, Cingisius, Cynegysius, or Cœngils; also Kengillus, Kemgisel), abbot of Glastonbury A.D. 729-743, succeeding Echfrid, is said to have received for the abbey a grant of land at Polonholt, Torric, and Brunantum from Ethelhard, king of Wessex, and his wife. In conjunction with abbot Ingeld and the presbyter Wietberhtus, he addressed a proposal of mutual intercessory prayer, the first of the kind on record, to the abbot Aldhun and the abbesses Cneuburga and Cœnburga, who replied in acceptance of it. His name appears in attestation of a doubtful charter of king Ethelhard, A.D. 737.

Cennfæladh, abbot of Bangor, commemorated April 8, was among the saints who went security for liberating the women (of Ireland) from military service, etc. He was grandson of Ædh Breac, and died A.D. 704.

Cennl, GAETANO, an Italian paleographer, who lived at Rome early in the 18th century, wrote, De Antiquitate Ecclesiæ Hispanæ (Rome, 1740-41):—Codex Carolinus et Codex Rudolphinus, Chronologia Dissertationibus et Notis Illustrata (ibid. 1760). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cennini, ANDREA, an Italian painter and author, who lived at Florence early in the 15th century, painted The Virgin, with several saints, in the Hospital of Bonifacio, at Florence, and other sacred subjects.

Cennydd (or Cenydd), a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was at first a member of the college of Cattrog, and afterwards founder of a religious society at a place in Gower, Glamorganshire, where the Church at Llangennydd is now situated.

Cenobites. See CENOBITES.

Cenônès were an order of ecclesiastical functionaries among the Montanists of the 2d century, superior to bishops and distinct from them.

Cenotaph, an empty monument erected by the ancient Greeks and Romans in honor of the dead who were either buried elsewhere or whose bodies could not be found. After the structures were completed the souls of the dead, for whom they were intended, were thrice called upon by name to occupy the habitations prepared for them.

Cenrawath is the name of a sect of the Banians (q. v.) in Hindustan, who hold the transmigration of souls so strictly that they will not kill the smallest creature. They drink no water without previously boiling it, lest they should swallow some insect. They burn the dead bodies of the old, but bury those of children under three years of age. Their widows are not obliged to burn themselves along with their husbands, but take upon them vows of perpetual widowhood. Any one who becomes a priest must assume the priestly dress, take the vow of chastity, and practice great austerities. This sect is held in great contempt by all the other Banians.

Censurius, Saint, confessor, and bishop of Auxerre. It is a disputed point when he held that see; but, according to Gams (Series Episcoporum, p. 501) it was from A.D. 472 to 502. His history is not certain. According to Usuard (Mart.) he is commemorated June 10.

Centaur, a fabulous creature in Greek mythology. The Centaurs of ancient myths must be distinguished from the later representation of double-bodied monsters.

Centaur Fighting with Hercules.

The former were a wild Thessalian nation inhabiting the woods and mountains. They were still more rough and barbarous than the Lapithæ, with whom they often fought, and by whom they were finally driven from their native region. Their hunting on horses may have been the occasion of the famous representation of them as a horse and man. These Centaurs were also said to have had a forefather, Centaurus, who sprang from the embrace of Nephele, by Ixion. The combats of the Centaurs with Hercules and Pirithous are especially famous. The Centaur Pholus had received from Bacchus a barrel of costly wine, which Hercules opened on his journey against the Erymanthian boar, whereupon the scent of the wine tempted the Centaurs to come and not only to drink the wine, but also to kill the stranger. Hence Hercules fought a frightful combat with them, which Nephele made still more severe, causing a rain to fall, whereby the ground became so slippery that Hercules was hardly able to stand. However, he was victorious, as most of the Centaurs fell by his weapons; among the killed were also his host, Pholus, and Chiron. The second combat occurred at the wedding of Pirithous, and was between the Lapithæ and the Centaurs. This fight ended in the extermination of the latter; a few who escaped to the island of the Sirens died of hunger. The Centaurs were a favorite subject of art among the Greeks.

Centenarius was an officer in ancient monasteries who presided over a hundred monks.

Centeotl, in Mexican mythology, was the goddess of the fruit-bearing earth, and of agriculture, with the surname Tonakaiohua—"the preserver." She had five temples at Mexico, and was worshipped there with the most brutal human sacrifices. Less frightful, however, was her worship among the Totonakas, who loved her because they believed she was the only goddess that was satisfied with the sacrifice of small animals, without asking human beings. It is believed that she is identical with the goddess Tonantzin, who had a far-famed temple on a high mountain north of the city of Mexico.

Center, SAMUEL, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Hoosick, N. Y., June 14, 1794. He was educated at Middlebury College, and studied theology in Rutgers College, New Brunswick, N. J. He was ordained by the Albany Presbytery in 1828, but was better known as a teacher than as a preacher. In 1837 he was professor in the University of Monroe, Mich.; afterwards principal of the Classical Academy in Albany, N. Y.; and finally principal of the academy at Angelica until his death, Jan. 27, 1859. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 69.

Centering (or Centre), as an architectural term, is the temporary support placed under vaults and arches to sustain them while in process of building, usually a frame of woodwork. In Centering of a Round-headed Arch.

XI.—28

Norman architecture, in which the vaulting is constructed with rough, unhewn stones, the centering was covered with a thick layer of mortar, in which the stones were imbedded, so that when the centering was removed it remained adhering to the under surface of the vault, exhibiting an exact impression of the boards on which it was spread. In Ireland hurdles were used instead of boards over the centering, and their impression frequently remains on the plaster.

Centimāni (Greek Hekatoncheires), in pagan mythology, were the hundred-armed giants, Briareus, Gyges, and Cottus, the sons of Uranus and Gæa. Because of their giant-like form and strength, they were dreaded by their father and placed by him in Tartarus. But Jupiter liberated them to fight the Titans, whom they besieged and placed in Tartarus in their own stead, and ever since guard there.

Centurius was a Donatist layman, who brought to the Church at Hippo a book written against Augustine by the Donatists, consisting of a compilation of Scripture testimonies to the nullity of baptism by unworthy ministers (e. g. Prov. v, 15-17).

Cenuualchus. See COKENWALCH.

Cenzontotochtin, in Mexican mythology, is the god of wine, who, from the effects of this drink, has two surnames, Tequechmekiani, "the murderer," and Teatlakuiani, "the stupefier." He had a temple with four hundred priests. In the thirteenth month of the Mexican year human sacrifices were brought him at his festival.

Ceode. See CAETI.

Ceolburg (Ciolburga, or Ceolburh) was abbess of Beorclea or Berkeley. Her name is attached to a charter of Offa, king of Mercia, A.D. 793, marked spurious or doubtful by Kemble. From her being mentioned in the Saxon chronicle, where her death is placed in A.D. 805, i. e. probably 807, she must have been a person of some note.

Ceolhelm was one of four presbyters of the diocese of Dunwich, attesting an act of the Council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 803.

Ceolla. See CELLACH.

Ceollach, the second bishop of the Mercian Church, was a Scot by birth. He was appointed bishop by Oswy before the end of the year 658, and was consecrated by Finan. His episcopate was very short; immediately, as it would seem, on the evacuation of Mercia by Oswy, he retired to Iona; about 659. In the Scotch calendars he appears as Colochus, Coluthus, Ceolla, and Colace (Forbes, Kal. Scottish Saints, p. 237, 299, 302), and elsewhere as Cellach (Malmesbury, Gestæ Pontif. ed. Hamilton, p. 307).

Ceolmund was (1) the single abbot of the diocese of Selsen, attesting an act of the Council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 803. Nothing is known of the monasteries within that diocese at this period. (2) The eleventh bishop of Hereford, who attests Mercian charters from 788 to 793.

Ceolnôdus, abbot of St. Peter's, Chertsey, received a grant from Offa, king of Mercia, issued in a synodal meeting at Acleah or Acle, i. e. Ockley, in Surrey, A.D. 787.

Ceolnoth, archbishop of Canterbury, was the first dean of Canterbury, and was consecrated archbishop Aug. 27, 833. His episcopate is celebrated in ecclesiastical history on account of a charter granted by king Ethelwulf, to which reference has been made by some historians, as the foundation of tithes to the Church of England. The custom prevailed during his administration, among the first converts to Christianity in England, of dedicating to God's service tenths or tithes arising from things that give a yearly increase. Archbishop Ceolnoth is also distinguished for the quantity of money which he coined. There are no less than twelve varieties of his coins in existence. This prelate's stormy career was closed by death in 870. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 284 sq.

Ceolue, a bishop, attests an undated and probably spurious charter of Coinwalch, king of Wessex; possibly intended for Ceollach (q. v.).

Ceolulfus, sacerdos, attests a charter of Offa, king of Mercia, A.D. 777.

Ceorra, deacon, attests a charter of Denebert, bishop of Worcester, about A.D. 802.

Ceowulf is the name of several early Christian characters:

1. King of Northumbria, from A.D. 729 to 737, is chiefly known from the circumstance of Bede dedicating to him his Ecclesiastical History. In 731 there seems to have been an insurrection in his kingdom, in which Ceowulf was seized and forcibly tonsured, as if to mock his ecclesiastical tastes. In 737 Ceowulf gave up his kingdom and became a monk in Lindisfarne, to which monastery he had been a liberal benefactor. Here he died in 764. After a time his body was removed by bishop Egred to the Church of Norham, and at a still later period his skull had a conspicuous place among the saintly relics in Durham.

2. The seventh bishop of the Lindisfari, at Sidnacester, who, according to Simeon of Durham, was consecrated April 24, 767. His name appears miswritten "Edeulfus Lindensis Faronensis episcopus," among the attestations of the Legantine Synod of 787, and is very frequently attached to the Mercian chapters from 767 to 796. The Anglo-Saxon chronicle mentions his departure from the land, and death in the year of Offa's death, A.D. 796.

Cepari, VIRGILIO, an Italian historian and ascetic theologian, of the order of the Jesuits, was born at Panicale, near Perugia, in 1564. He was rector in the Jesuit colleges at Florence and Rome, and died March 14, 1631, leaving, Vita di San Francesco di Borgia (Rome, 1624, 8vo);—Vita di Santa Francesca Romana:—Vita di Santa Maddalena di Pazzi:—Vita di San Luigi di Gonzaga:—Vita di Giovanni Berchmano:—Vita di San Stanislao di Kostka. These latter four lives have been translated into French and often reprinted. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Cephalomancy (from κεφαλή, the head, and μαντεία, divination) was a species of divination or ordeal practiced occasionally among the ancient Greeks with an ass's head, which they broiled upon coals, and, after muttering a few prayers, and mentioning the name of the suspected person, if the jaws moved and the teeth chattered, they thought his guilt established.

Cephas (Gal. ii, 11) was sometimes distinguished from Peter by early Christian writers, and said to be one of the seventy disciples by Clement of Alexandria (Hypotyposes, v), as recorded by Eusebius (H. E. i, 12). In the list of the seventy ascribed to Dorotheus, he is specified as bishop of Cannia. In the menology of Basil he is commemorated on Dec. 9, but nothing is said of him in the Synaxarion there given. The Armenian calendar commemorates Apollon and Cephas as disciples of Paul, Sept. 25. Dr. Lightfoot (Galatians, p. 128) refers to the constitutions of the Egyptian Church as representing him as one of the twelve distinct from Peter.

Ceponius was a Galician bishop, to whom, A.D. 447, the bishop of Astorga sent his refutation of the Priscillianists, and who was ordered by pope Leo I to assemble a council against them.

Ceracius. See CERATIUS.

Cerasianus was bishop at the Council of Sinuesse, A.D. 803, according to Labbe, Concil. i, 940.

Cerati, GASPARO, an Italian theologian, was born at Parma in 1690. He entered the society of the Oratory, soon attained ecclesiastical dignities, and visited the most celebrated universities of Europe. He was appointed convent-prior of the order of St. Stephen, and superintendent of the University of Pisa, where he rendered very important service to literature. He died June 19, 1769, leaving several works, of which only one has been printed, Dissertazione Postuma sull' Utilità dell' Inesto. Many of his letters are in the collection published by abbé Conti (Venice, 1812, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ceratus (or Ceracius), Saint, of Simorra, a bishop, is said to have been born of a princely Burgundian family, and to have been a pupil of Ambrose of Milan. But, in an ancient inscription in the Church of Eauze, he is called a disciple of "Saturninus Tolosanensis episcopus." He is called St. Ceratius of Simorra, because his remains were translated to, and preserved in, the Benedictine monastery of St. Mary in Simorra (diocese of Auch). There is some doubt as to the precise diocese over which he ruled. By some writers he is called bishop of Eauze, or Euse (Elusa), in Gascony, while others say that he was bishop of Grenoble. He is said to have had a long dispute with one of the sect of the Sadducees, to whom he expounded the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, and whom he converted. On that account there arose against him a bitter persecution, upon which he fled with his two deacons, Gervasius and Protasius, to an obscure place in Gascony, called Sainctes, where he won for himself great renown as a saint. St. Ceratius is commemorated June 6. See Bolland, Acta Sanctorum, June, i, 708.

Ceraunius, Saint, of Paris, appears to have been bishop of Paris from 614 to 625, and it is said that he was present at the fifth Council of Paris in 615. See Bolland, Acta Sanctorum, Sept. vii, 485.

Ceraunus. See CARAUNUS.

Cerban (Corbanus, or Cuirbin), bishop of Fear-Cearbain, at Teamhair, is given by Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, s. a. 473, c. 4) as one of the disciples of St. Ciaran of Saighir, and is identified with St. Corbanus, who was the friend of St. Mochteus, and is venerated as Cuir in the Devout on July 20. Colgan calls him presbyter Corbanus, and says a church was dedicated to him in Galway, and named after him Kill-Corbain. He died A.D. 504, or shortly before, according to the Irish annals.

Cerbērus, a fabulous dog in Greek mythology, was the son of Typhon and the snake Echidna, and was a hateful monster which sometimes is spoken of as having fifty, sometimes a hundred heads, but is generally represented with three. See PLUTO; SERAPIS. The poets describe him as snake-haired, with a dragon's tail, of frightful barbarity, poisonous breath and deadly sting. He guarded the shades of the infernal regions, allowed all to descend, but none to return, and the severest work was to fight this monster. Various persons attempted to combat him; among them, Orpheus, with his lyre, with which he put him to sleep. Hercules also was ordered, as one of his twelve works, to bring Cerberus from the infernal regions.

Cerbonius was bishop of Populonium (Gregor.

Magn. Dial. iii, 11). Gams (Series Episc. p. 755) assigns his appointment to A.D. 546.

Cercōpes, in Greek mythology, were thieving, tantalizing goblins. They were said to be inhabitants of the Pithecusian islands, and that Jupiter came to them for assistance in the war against the Titans. The Cercopes promised him assistance for a certain amount of gold; but when they had received their pay in advance, they ridiculed him, and refused to serve him, for which he changed them into apes, hence the name Pithecusian, i. e. ape-islands. Others understand two brothers under this name, Atlas and Candulus, sons of the Oceanidæ Thia, who lived in Lydia, where they played dishonest tricks on strangers.

Cerda, JUAN LUIS DE, a Spanish Jesuit, who was born at Toledo about 1560, and died at Madrid, May 6, 1643, is best known as the first editor of the Psalterium Solomonis, which he published with a Latin translation, introduction, and notes, as an appendix to his Adversaria Sacra (Lugd. 1626). He also wrote Commentaria in Tertullianum (Paris, 1624-30, 2 vols.). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 912; Heofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Cerdagne, GUILLAUME JOURDAIN, Count, a French knight, who went in 1102 to the Holy Land with Raymond IV of Toulouse, whom he succeeded in 1105. He died in 1109. See Heofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cerdic, a presbyter, attests a charter of Cynewulf, king of the West Saxons, A.D. 759.

Cerdo, (1) succeeded Abilius as bishop of Alexandria in 98, and was succeeded by Primus in 139 (Euseb. H. E. iii, 21; iv, 1). According to the legendary "Acts of St. Mark," Cerdo was one of the presbyters whom St. Mark ordained (Bolland, Acta Sanctorum, April 25). (2) A Manichean, taught his doctrines in A.D. 275, according to Jo. Malalas (Chron. xii, p. 399). Hody conjectures that this may possibly be Manes himself.

Cerdonians. See CERDO.

Cerealia, among the Romans, was a festival in honor of Ceres, in the month of April. Pigs and cows were sacrificed, plays of warriors were held in the circus, white dresses were worn, and a general festive time was enjoyed.

Cerealis was the name of several persons in early Christian history:

1. A vicarius sent by Hadrian to arrest the two brothers Gétulus and Amantius, tribunes and Christians, at Tivoli. He was converted by them, baptized by Sixtus I, arrested with them by one Licinius, and beheaded, June 10, cir. 124 (Tillemont, ii, 242).

2. A soldier converted by his prisoner, pope Cornelius, and beheaded along with him; as also his wife, Sabina, whom the pope had cured of palsy. See Tillemont, iii, 744.

3. A bishop (surnamed Afer) of Castellum, in Numidia, the author of a Libellus contra Maximinum Arianum. His own episcopal city and the neighboring towns having been devastated in the religious war carried on by Hunneric and his nephew Gundamund against the Catholics, Cerealis took refuge in Carthage, A.D. cir. 485, where he was confronted by Maximus, the Arian prelate of the Ariomanitæ (or Ammonitæ), who reproached him with the calamities which had fallen on those of the orthodox faith, as a proof of the displeasure of God. Being challenged by Maximus to prove the points at issue between the Arians and the orthodox from Scripture alone, he accepted the challenge on twenty assigned heads, each of which he demonstrated in favor of the Catholics by two or three quotations from the Bible. Maximus deferred his reply from day to day until he allowed judgment to go against him by default. See Gennadius, c. 96, Cave, Historia Literaria, i, 460.

Cerellæ. See CERILLI.

Ceremoniale is a book containing directions or rubrics for the due performance of certain ceremonies. The more ancient term for such a book is Ordo (q. v.).

Ceremonies, MASTERS OF THE, is a term applied to certain officers of the papal establishment, usually six in number, two of them being called assistants, and the other four supernumeraries. Their duties are to regulate all pontifical functions, acquaint the cardinals with their duties, and issue orders to all persons belonging to the court. Whenever the pope sends any cardinal à latere out of Rome, he deputes one of the supernumerary masters of the ceremonies to wait upon him. These officers usually wear purple cassocks, with black buttons and facings, and sleeves trailing on the ground; but in the papal chapel they wear a red cassock like the cardinals, and rochets like the prelates.

Cerenicus, Saint, deacon of Civitas Sagiorum (Séez), under the metropolitan of Rouen, went, with his friend Serenedus, to Rome, where they were ordained deacons. In the Life of St. Serenedus it is stated that after a moderate time the pope ordained them both cardinals of the Church; but this is thought by the Bollandists to be a mistake. Leaving Rome, they entered Gaul, and lived for a time at Mayence. Cerenicus founded the monastery of Cenomanum (Le Mans), and had one hundred and forty disciples. He lived to a good old age, and was buried in the Church of St. Martin, which he founded, and which was afterwards called after himself. He lived towards the end of the 7th century, and is commemorated May 7.

Ceres (among the Greeks Demeter), in pagan mythology, was the daughter of Saturn and Rhea. Saturn had swallowed Ceres, together with the rest of his children, but when Jupiter gave him an emetic, prepared by Metis, the daughter of Oceanus, he vomited them all up. By Jupiter Ceres became mother of Proserpina (in Greek Persephone, or Kore), and according to some also of Bacchus. The snares of Neptune she sought to avoid by changing herself into a horse; but the god did the same, and thus she gave birth by him to the famous horse Arion. The most important part of the mythical history of Ceres is found in the story of the rape of Proserpina: Jupiter had promised to give Proserpina to Pluto, without the knowledge of Ceres. Therefore when the daughter was gathering flowers with her companions near Enna, in Sicily, Pluto appeared suddenly, with four caused unfruitfulness in the country. At that time she dwelt in a cave near Phigalia, in Arcadia. Her whereabouts remained unknown to all the gods, until Pan, hunting in Arcadia, discovered her, whereupon Jupiter sent the Parææ to her, who succeeded in calming her. Mercury was thereupon ordered to get Proserpina from the infernal regions; but Pluto gave her the fruit of the pomegranate-tree to eat, in consequence of which she remained bound to his kingdom. Jupiter therefore ordered that Proserpina should remain two thirds of the year with her mother, and one third with her husband. Other stories relate of the goddess that she gave birth to Plutus (wealth) by Jupiter; that she transformed the Scythian king Lynceus into a lynx, because he sought to kill Triptolemus; that she caused bees to spring from the corpse of Melissa, a woman of the Isthmus, who had been killed by other women because she would not betray the mysteries of Ceres, thus making her the giver of honey; also that she caused Erysichthon, son of Triopas, to be continually plagued by a craving for food, because he cut down some trees in a sacred wood; and finally that she endowed Pandareus, son of Merops of Miletus, with the power of eating as much as he wished without being at all troubled in his body.

Ceres is the goddess of the fruit-bearing earth, therefore of agriculture; but she is also the goddess of marriage and of married women especially. The myth of her daughter returning from the depths of the earth was frequently used, especially in the mysteries relating to the immortality of the soul. The worship of Ceres was universal in Greece, especially in Athens. Her chief mysteries among the Athenians were the Thesmophoria and Eleusinia. The former were celebrated in October, and lasted three or four days, with a nine days' preparation. The Eleusinia were twofold, the lesser in February, the greater for nine days in September. Fruit-trees, also the elm, the hyacinth, and the poppy were sacred to Ceres. In Italy she was worshipped among the highest deities, and was placed on a level with Verumnus. The name Ceres is said to have come from the Sabines, and to denote bread in their language. In formal representations she is similar to Juno, but has a milder look; she is draped in full, and sometimes has her head covered. As accessories she was crowned with ears of wheat, in her hand was a sceptre, also poppy-stalks, and a basket containing the sacred articles used in her mysteries. She was sometimes borne in a car drawn by horses or winged dragons. See CEREAIA.

Ceresa (or Cerezi), CARLO, an eminent Bergamese historical and portrait painter, was born in 1609, and studied under Daniele Crespi, a painter of Milan. His works are chiefly confined to the churches of Bergamo. In the cathedral is a picture of St. Vincenzio Carried up to Heaven by Angels; in the cupola of San Francesco The Four Prophets; and in San Pietro one of his best works, representing The Resurrection. He died in 1679.

Ceretic. See CERDICE; COROTICUS.

Ceretus, (1) a bishop who writes to Augustine, sending him two books which had been recommended to him by one Argyrius. Augustine found them to be Priscillianist writings, and to include an apocryphal hymn said to have been sung by Christ and his disciples before they went out to the Mount of Olives (Augustine, Epist. 237 [253]; Labbe, Concil. ii, 1034). (2) The above may be the same as the bishop who, in A.D. 441, signs the canons of the Council of Orange, and who writes, in conjunction with Salonius and Veranus, to pope Leo, begging him to correct their copy of his letter to Flavian, and thanking him for the ability with which he provided for the prevention, as well as the cure, of heresy (Labbe, Concil. iii, 1434, 1452).

Cerezo, MATTEO, an eminent Spanish painter, was born at Burgos in 1635. He studied at Madrid, under Juan Carreño, and painted several pictures for the churches of Madrid and Valladolid. His best performance is, Christ with his Disciples at Emmaus. He died in 1685. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Ceriscus. See CYRICUS.

Ceridwen, in British mythology, was the goddess of nature, but also goddess of death as well as of the renewal of life, according to the Druid's doctrine of the transmigration of souls. Ceridwen was married to Tegid Voel, a man of high birth, whose fatherland lay in the middle of the Tigid sea. A son, Morvran, and a daughter, Creirvym, the prettiest girl of the world, were their children; besides these they also had another son, Avagddu, the most hateful-looking of all creatures. In order to comfort the latter under his deformity, his mother had a mystical vessel made, into which it was only necessary to look to discern the future. The preparation of the vessel, by boiling the contents, had to be carried on night and day without intermission, until the indwelling spirit presented three blessed drops. Ceridwen employed a man, therefore, the little Gwion, to oversee this process. But towards the end of the process, out of carelessness, the three drops flew out of the vessel on his finger; he swallowed them, and found that the future lay open before him. But Ceridwen, when she discovered that her pains for Avagddu had been lost, followed Gwion. After various changes, both of the pursued and pursuer, Gwion changed himself into an ear of wheat, Ceridwen into a hen, and ate the ear, whereupon she became pregnant and gave birth to a beautiful child, which she placed in a small boat and left to its fate. It was found by Elphins, the son of Gwyndnos, who named it Taliesin (radiant forehead), and discovered that the child was full of all wisdom, and able to make revelations. The vessel of Ceridwen was the symbol of a special order among the bards, who were the depositaries of certain secrets, and at festivals declaimed mysterious songs.

Cerisiers (or Ceriziers), RENÉ DE, a French historian and ascetic theologian, of the order of the Jesuits, was born at Nantes in 1609. After having taught in several colleges of his order, he asked and received secularization. He was then made chancellor and councillor of Louis XIV. He died in 1662, leaving a great number of historical and ascetic writings, of which the principal are, L'Image de Notre-Dame de Liesse (Rheims, 1622, 1623, 12mo); — Les Heureux Commencements de la France Chrétienne sous Saint-Remi (ibid. 1633, 4to; 1647, 8vo); — La Consolation de la Philosophie de Boèce, en Vers et en Prose (Paris, 1636, 4to; 6th ed. 1640, 12mo); — Consolation de la Théologie (1638); — Traductions des Soliloques de Saint-Augustin, avec les Méditations et le Manuel (ibid. 1638); — Traduction des Confessions of the same (ibid. eod. 12mo); — Vie de Sainte Genievre de Brabant (ibid. 1640, 4to); — Reflexions Chrétiennes et Politiques sur la Vie des Rois de France (ibid. 1641-44, 12mo), etc. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Ceroferarii. See CEROPERARII.

Ceromancy, a species of divination practiced among the ancient Greeks by means of wax, which they melted and let drop into water within three definite spaces, and, by observing the figure, distance, situation, and connection of the drops, gave answer to the questions proposed.

Ceroperarii are officers in the Church of Rome who have taken the place of the ancient order of acolytes. They carry the lighted tapers before the deacon, etc. The Pontifical assigns them no other duties than those of carrying the tapers, preparing the bread and wine for the sacrament, and using the thurible.

Cerqueira (or Cerquerra), LOIS, a Portuguese theologian of the Jesuit order, was born at Alvito in 1552. He was placed at the head of the missionaries whom Philip II sent to Japan. He was ordained before his departure, and for sixteen years presided over a house of his order at Naugasaki. He died Feb. 15, 1614, leaving, Manuale ad Sacramenta Ecclesie Ministranda (Nangasaki, 1605, 4to):—Manuale Casuum Conscientie (translated into Japanese, ibid.):—De Morte Sex Martyrum in Japonia (Rome, 1607, 8vo):—De Morte Melchioris Bugundoni et Damiani Cæci. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cerra. See ACERKA.

Cerrini, GIOVANNI DOMENICO (called il Cavaliere Perugino), a painter of Perugia, was born in 1609, and studied under Guido. His best work in fresco is in the cupola of the church of the Madonna di Monte Luce, representing St. Paul Taken up to Heaven. He died in 1681.

Certain, in ecclesiastical technology, is a lesser endowment for a mortuary mass, where the person was prayed for with a number of others, and not individually; the names being written all together on a board or plate above the altar.

Certani, GIACOMO, an Italian biographer and theologian, who lived in the latter part of the 17th century, wrote, La Chiave del Paradiso (Bologna, 1673, 4to):—Il Otto se della Ibernia (ibid. 1686, 4to):—La Vita della S. Brigida (translated into German by Schumann; Burghausen, 1735, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cerva, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a Milanese painter, flourished about 1550, and studied under Gaudenzio Ferrari. His only mentioned work is the Incredulity of Thomas, which ranks high.

Cerveau, RENÉ, a French writer, was born at Paris, May 22, 1700. He made himself remarkable by his zeal for Jansenism, and was one of the principal editors of the Nécrologe des plus Célèbres Défenseurs et Confesseurs de la Vérité (Paris, 1760-78, 12mo). He died in Paris, April 15, 1780, leaving also, L'Esprit de Nicole (ibid. 1765, 12mo):—Poème sur le Symbole des Apôtres et sur les Sacraments (ibid. 1768, 12mo):—Cantiques (ibid. eod. 12mo):—Les Mystères de Jésus Christ (ibid. 1770, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cervelli, FREDERICO, a Milanese painter, flourished about 1690, and studied under Pietro Ricchi. One of his best works is at the Scuola di San Teodoro, representing a subject from the life of that saint.

Cervi, BERNARDO, a painter of Modena, who died in 1630, was a scholar of Guido, and his principal works are his frescos, in the dome at Modena. There are also several altar-pieces in the churches. He executed an engraving of The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian.

Cerynthian (or Cerynean) Hind, in Greek mythology, was an animal of extraordinary swiftness, with golden horns and brazen feet, consecrated to Diana by the nymph Taugete. It lived on the mountain Ceryneia, in Arcadia; hence its name. Hercules was commanded to bring it alive to Eurystheus, and, after chasing it a whole year, he captured it near the river Ladon.

Cesari, ANTONIO, an Italian writer, was born at Verona, Jan. 16, 1760. He was a member of the order of St. Philip of Neri, and died Oct. 1, 1828, at Ravenna, having been a member of almost all the academies and learned societies of his country. He published, Vite de Santi Padri (Verona, 1799, 4 vols.):—La Vita del

B. Giovanni Colombini (ibid. 1817):—Fioretti di S. Francesco (ibid. 1822):—Lezioni Storico-morali (Milan, 1815-17, 5 vols.):—Vita di Gesù Cristo (Verona, 1817, 5 vols.):—Fioretti di Storia Ecclesiastica (ibid. 1828, 3 vols.). His life was written by Manuzzi (Florence, 1829), Bonfanti (Verona, 1832), Billardi (Padua, 1832), and Mordani (Ravenna, 1842). (B. P.)

Cesari, Bernardino, an Italian artist, was the brother and scholar of Giuseppe, whom he assisted in many of his works. He also painted several pictures of his own composition in the churches at Rome. There is a large fresco work in St. John of Lateran by this artist. In San Carlo a Catinari is a picture by him of Christ Appearing to Mary Magdalene.

Cesari, Giuseppe (Cavaliere d'Arpino), an eminent Italian painter, was born in 1560 at the castle of Arpino, in the kingdom of Naples. At the age of thirteen he went to Rome for employment, where he offered his services to prepare the palettes and colors of the artists who were then employed in the Vatican under Gregory XIII. He had been here but a short time when he sketched several pictures on the wall which attracted the attention of the pope, and the latter placed him in the school of Niccolò Circignani. Eventually he was considered the most distinguished painter in Rome, where there are many of his works, the principal being the cupola of San Prassede, representing The Ascension, with the Virgin and the Apostles; also, in San Gio. Grisogono, The Assumption of the Virgin. He died at Rome in 1640.

Cesarini, Alessandro, (1) an Italian prelate, was born near the end of the 15th century. He attached himself to the house of the Medici, became bishop of Pampeluna, was made cardinal by Leo X, and had different missions under popes Adrian VI, Clement VII, and Paul III. Cesarini died Feb. 13, 1542. He was considered a good jurisconsult, and wrote, Statuta:—Constitutiones. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cesarini, Alessandro (2), an Italian prelate of the same family with the foregoing, was born in 1592. He became first a clerk of the apostolical chamber, then a cardinal, and died Jan. 25, 1644, leaving in MS., Acta Consistorialia Urbani VIII. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Cesarins were a religious order which arose in the 13th century in consequence of various abuses having crept into the order of St. Francis. The abuses complained of, however, having been reformed, the order of the Cesarins ceased to exist.

Cesi, Bartolommeo, an eminent Italian painter, was born at Bologna in 1556, and studied under Gio. Francesco Bezzi, but afterwards adopted the style of Pellegrino Tibaldi. His works are quite numerous at Bologna. The principal are: in San Giacomo Maggiore, The Virgin and Infant in the Clouds, with a Glory of Angels; also St. John; St. Francis; St. Benedict; in San Martino, The Crucifixion; in San Domenico, The Adoration of the Magi; and The Descent of the Holy Ghost; in the Certosa are his fine pictures of Christ Praying in the Garden, and The Descent from the Cross. He died in 1629. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cesi (or Cesio), Carlo, a historical painter and engraver of the Roman school, was born in 1626, at Antrodocco, in the Papal States, and studied under Pietro da Cortona. In the Quirinal, he painted The Judgment of Solomon; and others of his works are in the Rotonda and in Santa Maria Maggiore. He died in 1686. The following are some of his principal prints: The Virgin and Infant Jesus, with St. John; St. Andrew

Led to Martyrdom, Prostrating himself before the Cross. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cespedes, PABLO (called in Italian Cedaspe), a very eminent Spanish painter, was born at Cordova in 1538. He visited Rome twice for improvement, and derived great advantage from the study of the productions of Michael Angelo. While there he executed several paintings, among them an Annunciation and a Nativity, in the Trinita dei Monti; also several subjects from the life of the Virgin, in the vault of the same chapel. His works are chiefly at Cordova; in the cathedral is The Virgin and Infant, with St. Anna; also his admirable picture of The Last Supper. He died at Rome in 1608. He was a fine antiquarian, well acquainted with ancient and modern languages, and wrote several works on archæological subjects. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cession is an act of discipline in the Church of Rome, technically styled cessatio a divinis, by which, for any notorious injury or disobedience to the Church, a stop is put to all divine offices and the administration of the sacraments, and the dead are deprived of Christian burial. The only privilege allowed is to repeat every week a private mass in the parish churches, the doors being shut, taking care also not to ring the bell, or to admit more than two persons to the service; to administer baptism, confirmation, and penance to such persons as desire it, provided they are not under sentence of excommunication or an interdict; and to administer extreme unction, provided the prayers which are said before and after that sacrament are not repeated. Cession may be incurred by a whole diocese, a city, a village, or one or more churches.

Cession is a term employed in the Church of England, when a benefice has become void in consequence of the incumbent being promoted to a bishopric.

Cessoles (Lat. De Cessolis, Cassolis, or Casulis), JACQUES DE, a French theologian and moralist, who lived at Rheims in the 13th century, was, as is supposed, a native of the village of Cessoles, in Picardy, whence his name. He took monastic orders, and about 1290 wrote a book in Latin on the Morality of Chess-games, which was long circulated in MS., and was first printed in Holland (about 1473), and afterwards in various languages (Italian, first at Milan, 1479; last at Florence, 1829; French, Paris, 1504; English, by Caxton, 1474, etc.).—Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cethech, an Irish saint, bishop of Cill-garadh, is commemorated June 16. He is usually known as St. Patrick's bishop. His father belonged to Meath, and his mother was of the race of Olildus or Tirellil. He was born at Donnagh Sarige, near Duleek, and when St. Patrick was going westward through Roscommon, he gave the church of Cill-garadh to St. Cethech, who was buried there at the end of the 5th century. He had many churches under his charge (Colgan, Tr. Thaum., p. 135, 136, 176, 267).

Cethuberis was a virgin whom Joceline (Life of St. Patrick, c. 79) thus calls, and afterwards (c. 188), Ethembría; and whose name assumes a great multiplicity of forms, as Cectamaria, Cectumbria, and perhaps Euhmair, etc. She is said to have been the first who received the veil in Ireland from St. Patrick, at her monastery of Druim Duchain, near Clogher, and is supposed by some to be the "una benedicta Scotta" alluded to in St. Patrick's confession, and by others to be St. Cinna (Feb. 1).

Cewydd-ab-law, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, was founder of Aberedw and Diserth, in Radnorshire, and of Llangewydd, an extinct church near Bridgend, in Glamorganshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 230).

Chabar, in Oriental mythology, is a somewhat vaguely known deity from the times before Mohammed, worshipped by the ancient Arabs. It is doubtful whether this deity represents the moon or Aphrodite.

Chabas, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH, an illustrious French Egyptologist, was born Jan. 2, 1817, at Briançon, in the department of the Hautes-Alpes. He spent his early years in business, yet from boyhood cherished an ardent love for learning, and devoted all his leisure moments to the study of ancient and modern languages. When, in 1852, he retired from active life, he settled at Chalons-sur-Saône, and turned his attention to Egyptology. He soon became a master, and his first pamphlet, entitled Note sur l'Explication de Deux Groupes Hiéroglyphiques, bears the date 1856. From this time he was a constant contributor to the different periodicals and reviews, and speedily rose to a position of authority equal to that of his former masters, Dr. Birch and the vicomte E. de Rougé. Living in profound seclusion in a provincial town, he accumulated for his own use a complete and costly collection of Egyptological books, and with no other aid gained and kept one of the foremost places in the ranks of modern science. He died at Versailles, May 17, 1882. Although he had never visited Egypt, yet, as Eugène Revillout has said of him, "It was he who first laid down with certainty the scientific bases of Egyptian metrology; it was he who, with the hand of a master, first indicated the broad connecting lines of history and chronology; it was he who gave us the first, and, till now, the only materials concerning the criminal law of the epoch of the Pharaohs." Chabib, JACOB IBN-, a Jewish writer early in the 16th century, was a native of Zamora. He was one of the Spanish exiles who had settled at Saloniki, in Asia Minor. He is the author of a collection of haggadic sentences from the Talmud, to which he added explanations of his own and of others, under the title of, צִיָּן יִשְׂרָאֵל, Fountain of Jacob, more commonly known as the Fountain of Israel, צִיָּן יִשְׂרָאֵל (Constantinople, 1516, and often since; last edition, Berlin, 1874, 5 vols.). From this work, Genebrard made his compilation, entitled Collectanea de Rebus Christi Regis, which he translated into Latin, and published with his Latin translation of the Seder Olam Suta (Paris, 1572). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 151 sq.; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 69; Steinschneider, Jewish Literature, p. 222; Finn, Siphar-dim, p. 299; Grätz, Gesch. der Juden, ix, 41. (B. P.)

Chabib, LEVI BEN-, a Jewish writer, son of Jacob, with whom he had to leave Spain in 1492, was rabbi at Jerusalem, where he died in the middle of the 16th century. He is the author of Decisions (Venice, 1565), and also wrote a commentary on Maimonides' treatise on the Jewish calendar, מִדְּבַר הַחֹדֶשׁ, printed with Maimonides' Mishna Torá (Venice, 1574-76, a.o.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 152; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 70. (B. P.)

Chabib, MOSES BEN-, a Jewish writer, was a native of Lisbon, in the 16th century. In the persecution against the Jews, he had to leave the country. He is the author of מִדְּבַר הַחֹדֶשׁ, printed with Hebrew Grammar (Venice, 1546):—מִדְּבַר הַחֹדֶשׁ ON New-Hebrew Metrics (written at Bitonto della Puglia in 1486, and published together with the first work). Both were edited, with additions, by W. Heidenheim (Rödelheim, 1806). He also wrote a commentary on Penini's Bechinath Olam (Ferrara, 1552), etc. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 153; Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Handb., p.

Chabry, MARC, a French painter and sculptor, was born at Lyons in 1660, and studied there under Puget. He executed in that city a large number of works in both departments of art, among which were the paintings and bass-reliefs that adorn the great altar of the Church of St. Antoine; also two statues of Hercules and The Virgin, for the king, who appointed him sculptor to the city of Lyons. He died there in 1727. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chacabut was a religious sect of the Japanese, so called after their founder Chaca or Xaca, whose name there signifies what Buddha does in India. They revere him rather as a god than as a religious teacher.

Chacaras was the name of the sun-priests among the Peruvians.

Chace, George Shepherd, a Baptist minister, was born at Penn Yan, N. Y., March 9, 1826. He studied at Madison University, N. Y., from 1848 to 1850, and graduated from Rochester University in 1852, and from the Rochester Theological Seminary in 1854. His pastorates were in Warren, R. I., Pittsburgh, Pa., Columbus, O., Detroit, Mich., and New Bedford, Mass. He died June 27, 1871. See Gen. Cat. of Rochester Theol. Sem., p. 10. (J. C. S.)

Chace, Hannah, a minister of the Society of Friends, wife of Harvey Chace, a prominent member of Swansey Monthly Meeting, died at Fall River, Mass., July 20, 1833, aged thirty-two years. See The Friend, vi, 359.

Chachy, in the mythology of Kamchatka, was the wife of the god Kutku, the creator of the world. She was not beautiful, but very sensible. From her sprang the Kamchadales, i. e. the aborigines of that peninsula.

Chacon (Lat. Ciconius), Alfonso, a learned Spaniard, was born in 1540 at Baeza, in Andalusia. He entered the order of preaching friars, and went to Rome, where Gregory XIII appointed him apostolical penitentiary. He was well versed in ecclesiastical history and antiquities. He died at Rome in 1599. His principal works are, De Liberatione Trajani a Pœnis Inferni (Rome, 1576);—Historia Utriusque Belli Dacici a Trajano (ibid. eod.);—De S. Hieronymi Cardinalitii Dignitate (ibid. 1591);—Vita et res Gestæ Pontificum Romanorum Cardinalium (ibid. 1601), etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Chacon, Pedro, a learned Spaniard, was born at Toledo in 1525. He taught at Salamanca, was appointed canon of Seville by Gregory XIII, and was charged by the same pope with revising the Bible, the writings of the fathers, and the decretal of Gratian. Chacon commented upon a large number of sacred and profane writers, and was admired by many of his contemporaries for his learning. He died at Rome, Oct. 24, 1581. His works were not published until after his death. His principal writings are, Culendarii Veteris Explanatio (Antwerp, 1586);—Opuscula, containing archæological treatises (Rome, 1586; also in Grævii Thesaur.);—De Triclinio Romano (ibid. 1588). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Chad of Wessex. See CRADDA.

Chadbourne, John, a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about 1770. He was ordained as an evangelist in Cornish, Me., in 1798, having previously been the deacon of the Church. In 1799 he began to preach in Lemington, Vt. A number of persons were converted and joined the Church in Cornish. Their numbers increasing, they formed a new Church, and invited him to become their pastor. He remained with them one year, and then resigned. For several years he was engaged in itinerant work in the newly settled part of the state, and in 1809 became pastor of the church in Dixmont, Me. Here he remained two years (1809–11). From 1816 to 1826 he acted as supply, and in 1827 again became regular pastor at Dixmont, which position he held until his death in 1831. See Millett, Hist. of the Baptists of Maine, p. 439. (J. C. S.)

Chadbourne, Paul A., D.D., LL.D., a Congregational minister and educator, was born at North Berwick, Me., Oct. 21, 1823. He worked hard, in his boyhood, on a farm and in a carpenter-shop; studied pharmacy and medicine; fitted for college at the Phillips Academy, Exeter; and was a graduate of Williams College, with the highest honors of his class, in 1848. After teaching school for a time at Freehold, N. J., he studied theology at East Windsor, Conn.; was tutor at Williams College, then principal of the Windsor Hill Academy, and then was appointed professor of chemistry and natural history at Williams College. While holding this position he also, for a part of the year, gave lectures on the same subjects at Bowdoin College (1859–65); and on the retirement of professor Uxham, of the same institution, he had charge of the department of moral philosophy and metaphysics (1871–72). For thirteen years he gave chemical lectures at Mt. Holyoke Seminary. He was professor in the Berkshire Medical College three years, president of Madison University, Wis. (1867–70), in which was also included the Agricultural College of Wisconsin. From 1872 to 1881 he was president of Williams College, Mass.; and in January, 1882, became president of the Massachusetts Agricultural College at Amherst. He died in the city of New York, Feb. 23, 1883. Besides volumes on natural theology, etc., he was a frequent contributor to reviews and journals. See The Congregationalist, March 1, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Chaddock, CALVIN, a Congregational minister, was born at Oakham, Mass. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1791; was ordained pastor of the Third Church in Rochester, Mass., Oct. 10, 1793; resigned his charge in 1805, and died in 1823. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 697.

Chaderton, WILLIAM, an English prelate of the 16th century, was born probably in Cheshire. He became first a fellow, then master of Queen's College, Cambridge; was chosen Lady Margaret professor of divinity, then king's professor; was made bishop of Chester in 1579, of Lincoln in 1594, and died in April, 1608. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 269.

Chadoënus (Chadoin, Caduindus, Clodoënus, Harduinus, Hadwinus, Hardoin), Saint, a French prelate, was twelfth or thirteenth bishop of Le Mans, about 623. He was present at the Council of Rheims in 625. His will and a charter, given by him to the monastery of Anisolum, are to be found in vol. lxxx of the Patrol. Lat. p. 567. Mention is also made of him in the Council of Châlons, in 644, where abbot Chagnoald represented him. He died in 653, and is commemorated on Aug. 20, the day of his death.

Chaduc, BLAISE, a French theologian, was born in 1608 at Riom, in Auvergne. He entered the Society of the Oratory, and was one of the most famous preachers of his time. He died at Paris, Jan. 14, 1695, leaving, Lettre sur l'Usure (1672, 4to);—Traité de la Nature l'Usure (Avignon, 1675, 16mo);—a collection of sermons, under the title of Dieu Enfant (Lyons, 1682, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chadwell, WILLIAM STONE, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Long Island, entered the ministry in 1854. In 1857 he officiated at Eastport, Me.; and in 1859 became rector of Christ Church in that place. The following year he served as rector of St. Luke's Church, Catskill, N. Y., and retained this pastorate until 1868, when he removed to Williamsburg, N. Y., as rector of Grace Church. He died at Welford, Me., July 28, 1877. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 168.

Chadwick, James, D.D., a Roman Catholic prelate, was born at Drogheda, Ireland, April 24, 1813. He was educated at St. Cuthbert's College, near Durham, where, at different times, he filled the chairs of humanities, mental philosophy, and pastoral theology; laboring, also, part of the time, as missionary priest in the diocese of Hexham and Newcastle, of which see, in 1866, he was appointed bishop. He died May 14, 1882.

Chadwick, Job, a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about 1770. He was ordained an evangelist at Vassalborough, Me., in 1796; and in 1797 was chosen pastor of the Second Baptist Church in China, Kennebec Co., where he remained eight years. He next removed to Gouldsborough, where he was pastor between 1816 and 1831. During the interval between these two pastorates, Mr. Chadwick was acting as a missionary, under the direction of the Massachusetts Home Mission Society, in the destitute regions of Maine and on Cape Cod, Mass. His final residence was at Windsor, Me., where he died, Dec. 25, 1831. See Millett, History of the Baptists of Maine, p. 439. (J. C. S.)

Chærémon was the name of several early Christians:

1. An aged bishop of Nilus, who fled from the Decian persecution to the Arabian mountains with his wife and was never heard of more (Euseb. H. E. vi, 42).

2. A deacon of Alexandria, who accompanied Dionysius, when he came before Æmilian in the time of Valerian. He is commemorated along with him, on Oct. 4, in the Menology of Basil, and is represented as surviving backwards till the time of Decius, when he was beaten to death. The rest of the legend seems to belong rather to Eusebius (H. E. vii, 11).

3. Saint, a recluse, who probably lived in the 4th or 5th century, or in both, as he died at the age of one hundred years, the greater part of which he spent in seclusion in the wilderness of Mount Scete, in Libya. The memory of this saint is chiefly confined to the Greeks, who commend him as a pattern of patient labor. There is a short chapter on him in Palladius (Hist. Lausiaca, xcii, 765; Patrol. Lat. lxxiii, 1186). The Bollandists cite Petrus de Natalibus (xi, 57), who calls the recluse Theremon, and says he was so bent with age and prayer that he crawled on the ground like an infant. He is commemorated on Aug. 16, in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists.

Chaffer, Thomas F., a Congregational minister, was born at Hull, England, Nov. 14, 1830. He came to America in 1838, and resided in Kentucky; graduated from Farmers' College in 1856 and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1865. April 11, 1866, he was ordained at Rising Sun, Ind.; and from that time until 1870 was acting-pastor at Downer's Grove, Ill. Subsequently he resided, without charge until 1872, in Kansas. From 1872 until 1877 he was acting pastor at Morgan, O.; in 1878 and 1879 served in the same relation at East Smithfield, Pa.; and from 1879 at Rock Creek, O., until his death, which occurred there, May 14, 1882. See Cong. Year-book, 1883, p. 20.

Chafey, Abū Abd-Allah-Mohammed ben-Edris, El-, founder of one of the four orthodox Mussulman sects, was born at Gaza, in Palestine, in the year 150 of the Hegira (A.D. 767). He took the surname of el-Chafey, from one of his ancestors. His disciples gave him the name of Arab-b-illah ("wise in God"). El-Chafey is the first imam who wrote about jurisprudence, civil as well as canonical, of the Mussulman law, and his decisions are still adopted in Egypt. They are in three treatises, called, Ossid, Sumân, and Mesned. The sultan Salâh-êd-Dîn, wishing to eradicate the principles of the sect of Ali, which the Fatimites had imposed upon all Egypt, summoned the doctors of Islam to Cairo, and charged them to preach the orthodox doctrine. The sect of the Chafeyites received from him particular support and encouragement; and in the year 569 of the Hegira he built, near the tomb of imam Chafey, a magnificent college for theology and Mussulman jurisprudence, where no other doctrine was permitted. El-Chafey died in Egypt in the year 204 of the Hegira (A.D. 821). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chaffault, Pierre du, a French canon, was elected March 10, 1477, to the bishopric of Nantes. He would not accept the bishopric, except on condition that the differences between the duke and the bishop concerning the oath of fidelity should be terminated, which took place Dec. 27, 1477. He busied himself with the spiritual administration of his diocese, reviving the ancient statutes. He also caused a breviary and a missal to be printed at Venice. Du Chaffault made a journey to Rome in 1483, and remained there nearly two years. Duke Francis II of Brittany suspected him of collusion with Charles VIII of France, and he was watched during the siege of Nantes by the revolting French and Breton barons in 1487. He was imprisoned in his cathedral, which he continued to construct. He died Nov. 12, 1487, leaving a reputation for great holiness. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chaffee, Chester, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Grafton, Vt., in 1791. He united with the Church in 1815, began his ministry in 1830, and was ordained in 1832. After having lived many years in Boston, N. Y., he removed to Arcade, Wyoming County, in 1850, where he thenceforth resided, adorning his profession as a Christian and his vocation as a minister. He died there, Sept. 5, 1876. See Morning Star, Nov. 8, 1876. (J. C. S.)

Chaffey, Thomas, an English Congregational minister, was born at Sherborne, Dorset, Dec. 26, 1783. He began to study medicine; but, being converted, was engaged in Sunday-school work, and afterwards in village preaching. He was recommended to the Academy at Axminster as a candidate for the ministry, and was ordained at Bulford, Wiltshire, Jan. 30, 1813, where he labored for seven years and then resigned. In 1823 he settled at Greenhithe, Kent, where he remained about four years. Ill-health caused him to relinquish pastoral labor, and for seventeen years he supplied various places in town and country as he was able; he was, however, chiefly occupied in assisting Rev. Dr. Fletcher of Finsbury Chapel. He died in the faith, Aug. 5, 1854. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1855, p. 209.

Chaffey, W. W., an English Congregational minister, was born at Chard, Somersetshire, June 14, 1837. He became a Christian in youth; entered Cheshunt College in 1861 for a ministerial discipline; and in 1865 began his pastorate at Hillhouse, Huddersfield, where he preached but a few months, and then, from ill-health, was obliged to resign the ministry. He died Aug. 21, 1866. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1867, p. 277.

Chaffin, Aaron Wheeler, a Baptist minister, was born at Langrove, Vt., July 9, 1821, and graduated from Brown University in 1846. He studied theology at Newton for one year (1846-47), and was ordained in April, 1850. For twelve years (1850-62) he was pastor of the church in Danversport, Mass.; next in Manchester, N. H., five years (1863-68); and finally in Hudson, N. Y. (1868-73). He died in 1874. See Newton General Catalogue, p. 35. (J. C. S.)

Chagis, Jacob, an Oriental Jewish rabbi, who died at Constantinople in 1688, is the author of יקרלה חכמה, or a Methodology of the Talmud (Verona, 1647; Amsterdam, 1709):—קרבן מנחה, on Riles:—ספן הריים, a Commentary on the Mishna (Leghorn, 1672), and others.

See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 154; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 71. (B. P.)

Chagis, Moses, a Jewish writer, son of Jacob, was born in 1670, and was a rabbi at Jerusalem, but at length settled in Amsterdam, where he supported himself by instructing young men in the Talmud. In the excitement which ensued against him and Ashkenazi, on account of the ban which they had pronounced against the impostor Chajon (q. v.), he was obliged to leave Holland, and went to Altona, and thence to Sidon, where he died, about 1744. He wrote, פרשת אלה, a topographical description of Jerusalem and the holy sepulchres (Altona, 1738):—שפת אמת, on the migrations of the Jews to Palestine (Amst. 1707):—שבר פושעים, against Chajon's heresy and his adherents (Lond. 1714). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 155; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 71; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Chagis, Samuel, a Jewish writer, father of Jacob, at one time a rabbi in Fez, Africa, is the author of discourses on the first four books of the Pentateuch, entitled, מבקש יי (Venice, 1596). Besides, he wrote, דבר שמיאל, comments on passages of the Midrash Rabba (ibid. eod.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 155 sq.; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 71; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Chail is a Coptic title for a bishop. See COPTIC CHURCH.

Challasaeka, in Hindû mythology, was a numerous generation of hateful dæmons, who lived on small insects. The Sudras (the lowest of the four castes) are changed into such dæmons after their death in case they neglect their calling, which is to serve the three other castes.

Chainoaldus, Saint. See CAQUOALDUS.

Chaitu, in the mythology of the Kamchadales, is an idol in the form of a wolf, made of vegetables and grass, and placed near the habitations of the natives, who ascribe to it the power of keeping off evil animals.

Chaitya is the name applied among the Buddhists to all objects proper to be worshipped. These were of three kinds: 1. The relics of the body of Gotama, collected after his cremation. 2. Such things as have been erected on his account, i. e. images of his person. 3. The articles he possessed, such as his girdle, his alms-bowl, the robe he put on when he bathed, the vessel from which he drank water, and his seat or throne.

Chajon, NEHEMIAH CHIJA, a Jewish impostor, was born about 1650. He received his Talmudic education at Hebron, where the pseudo-Messiah Sabbathai Zebi (q. v.) had his adherents. When eighteen years of age he became rabbi at Uskupia, not far from Saloniki, but, on account of his immoral life, he was compelled to leave the place. From this time his adventurous life commenced, which brought him in contact with a great many literary men, who either supported or opposed him. By the way of Egypt Chajon came to Leghorn, where he was opposed by Joseph Ergas (q. v.). At Prague he was supported by D. Oppenheimer (q. v.). In the house of the chief rabbi he had not only leisure to write some of his works, but also delivered sermons at sundry occasions, which, though replete with the greatest nonsense, were readily applauded. From Prague, Chajon went to Amsterdam, where he was opposed by Zebi Ashkenazi (q. v.) and Moses Chagis (q. v.), who, in connection with Ashkenazi, pronounced the ban against Chajon. The latter left Amsterdam, and went hither and thither. Everywhere he was persecuted, and, finding no resting-place, he finally went to North Africa, where he died after 1726. His writings are הבשר והרוח, Sermons and Comments on the Pentateuch, written in the house of Oppenheimer, and published with the approbation of this and other rabbis (Berlin, 1713):—פֶּתַח עֶלְיוֹן, The Crown of the Highest, on the doctrine of the unity of God (Venice, 1711):—מִחְמֵדוֹתָהּ רַבְלָא, or a system of the Judæo-cababistic religion, to which are appended two large cababistic and theosophic commentaries, the מִקְדָּשִׁים and פֶּתַח מֶן שְׁמַיָא (Berlin, 1713):—עֲזֵר לְאֶלְהִים, a treatise on the true conception of the Cabala (Amsterdam, 1714):—רֵצָא רִיחֻדָּא, The Secret of the Unity of God (Venice, 1711). Chakām (Heb. חָכָם, a wise man), the name given in some countries to the chief or presiding rabbi among the modern Jews, who holds a spiritual and, to some extent, civil authority over a country or large district. The term is usually applied to the chief rabbi among the Spanish or Portuguese Jews.

Chakara or Chakra, in Hindû mythology, is the mighty weapon of Vishnu, endowed with reason, which by its brightness lights up the entire paradise of the god. It was a ring containing a beautiful gem, and can be seen on the pictures of the god. This ring was made of rays cut from the sun.

Chakia-Mûni was a name adopted by Buddha, according to the legendary accounts given by the Mongol books, which are only translations from the Thibetan or Sanscrit. He laid down certain principles of morality as the foundation of his religious system. These he reduced to four: 1. The power of pity resting upon immovable bases. 2. The avoidance of all cruelty. 3. An unlimited compassion towards all creatures. 4. An inflexible conscience. Then follows the decalogue, or ten special prescriptions and prohibitions: 1, not to kill; 2, not to rob; 3, to be chaste; 4, not to bear false witness; 5, not to lie; 6, not to swear; 7, to avoid all impure words; 8, to be disinterested; 9, not to avenge one's self; 10, not to be superstitious. The new prophet pretended to have received these precepts by revelation from heaven; and when he died, at the age of eighty, they began to spread throughout all Asia, as a divine code of morality. See BUDDHA.

Chalcedon, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Chalcedonense). Of these there were two:

I. Held A.D. 403, better known as "the Synod of the Oak"—a name given to a suburb there—at which Chrysostom was deposed. He had been appointed to the see of Constantinople five years before, and Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, had been summoned thither by the emperor Arcadius to ordain him. Theophilus had a presbyter of his own whom he would have preferred, named Isidore, so that in one sense he consecrated Chrysostom under constraint. It was against the second of the Constantinopolitan canons likewise for him to have consecrated at all out of his own diocese; but in another sense he was probably not loath to make Chrysostom beholden to him, and be possessed of a pretext for interfering in a see threatening to eclipse his own, where he could do so with effect. Hence the part played by him at the Synod of the Oak, over which he presided, and in which no less than twelve sessions were occupied on charges brought against Chrysostom, and a thirteenth on charges brought against Heraclides, bishop of Ephesus, who had been ordained by him. The number of charges alleged against Chrysostom was twenty-nine at one time, and eighteen at another. When cited to appear and reply to them, his answer was: "Remove my avowed enemies from your list of judges, and I am ready to appear and make my defence, should any person bring aught against me; otherwise you may send as often as you will for me, but you will get no further." The first of those whom he reckoned as such was Theophilus. One of the charges against him was some unworthy language that he had used to Epiphanius, lately deceased. The others refer to his conduct in his own church, or towards his own clergy. The synod ended by deposing Chrysostom, having cited him four times to no purpose, when he was immediately expelled the city by the emperor, and withdrew into Bithynia, to be very shortly recalled. See CHRYSOSTOM.

II. Held in 451, and so important that we give additional particulars:

The heresy of Eutyches consisted in his acknowledging only one nature in our Lord Jesus Christ: he was a priest, and abbot of a monastery near Constantinople; and Eusebius, bishop of Dorylæum, having cited him to give an account of his faith before a council consisting of thirty-three bishops and twenty-three abbots, Eutyches there refused to retract, and was condemned and separated from the communion of the faithful. He then took upon him to write to Leo, the pope, imploring his protection, and sent to him a pretended profession of his faith. Leo, deceived by these pretences, wrote to Flavianus of Constantinople, expressing his surprise at the sentence passed upon Eutyches. Flavianus wrote back to him a true account of the matter, declaring that Eutyches maintained that before his incarnation our Blessed Lord had two natures, the divine and human, but that after his incarnation he had but one; and he further entreated the pope to add his own testimony to the condemnation of Eutyches. By these statements Leo was convinced of the justice of the sentence, and, moreover, perceived the bad results which must follow from the patronage which the emperor Theodosius extended to Eutyches, especially in convoking a council at Ephesus to reconsider the sentence of excommunication which had been passed upon him.

This pseudo-council assembled at Ephesus in 449, consisting of one hundred and thirty bishops, with Dioscorus of Alexandria, the great friend of Eutyches, as president; the censure before passed upon the latter was annulled, and Flavianus, who had condemned him, was deposed. This pseudo-council, from the extreme irregularity and violence which accompanied all its acts, has been always known by the name of the "Latrocinium." Leo, distressed at these proceedings, wrote to the emperor a letter worthy of a Christian bishop, setting clearly before him what impious and sacrilegious acts had been done in that council, in open violation of the Catholic faith and of the canons of the Church; and he implored him in the name of all the churches of the West to convocate an oecumenical council in Italy. At the same time, he wrote to Pulcheria to entreat her to use all her influence to hinder this attack upon the Catholic faith from having more fatal results. He, lastly, addressed the clergy and people of Constantinople, and exhorted them to persevere in the true faith.

Dioscorus, irritated by the opposition which his designs met with, and especially by that of Leo, separated himself from his communion, and by threats or otherwise induced ten other bishops to concur in this schismatical act. This only caused Leo to redouble his efforts, and availing himself of the opportunity of a voyage which the emperor, Valentinian III., made to Rome at the time, he forcibly set before him the danger with which the true faith was threatened, and conjured him to induce Theodosius to repair by his authority the evil that had been committed at Ephesus, and to annul all that they had decreed there in an oecumenical assembly. But although Valentinian wrote upon the subject to Theodosius, he refused to permit the question to be re-agitated, and endeavored to justify the act of the pseudo-council of Ephesus.

However, Theodosius dying that year in consequence of injuries received by a fall from his horse, Marcian, by his marriage with Pulcheria, became emperor, and all obstacles to the holding of the council were removed. His chief desire was to see all his subjects united in one faith; and the empress herself wrote to Leo, to assure him of her anxiety to see peace restored to the Church, and to banish all error and heresy, and for that end to cause the council to be assembled.

Among the large number of bishops, three distinguished ones were present, viz.: Maximus of Antioch, Eusebius of Dorylæum, and Theodoret, whom the emperor had recalled from exile. The emperor sent as his representatives the chief officers of the empire: Anatolius, a nobleman; Palladius, præfect of the Prætorium in the East; the præfect of Constantinople, Vincomulus; Sporicus, captain of the imperial guard; various other persons of the highest dignity were also present. Marcian, from the high idea which he had formed of Leo, wished him to have the chief authority in the council; and Leo, in his letter, begged them to consider his legates as his representatives, and especially designated Paphlagonius, bishop of Lilybæum, in Sicily, to act as president in his absence, rightly judging that there was needed at the head of the council a man of firm mind, and one incapable of being turned aside from the right path. It was arranged that the officers of the emperor should propose the questions for discussion, draw up the various motions, and pronounce the decision, after the bishops had given their votes.

In the first session, at the request of Eusebius of Dorylæum, the petition which he had presented to the emperor against Dioscorus was read. In this petition Eusebius demanded justice for the evils which Dioscorus had done to himself and Flavianus of Constantinople: he charged him with having favored Eutyches in everything; with having made use of notorious violence and the most unworthy means, in order to procure the absolution of Eutyches. He then required that the acts of the pseudo-council of Ephesus should be read, by which he hoped to show the injustice of Dioscorus in deposing Flavianus and himself. In the course of reading many passages occurred highly injurious to Theodoret, which induced the emperor to order, by his officers, that he should enter, and take his place in the council, but the Egyptians, with great tumult, refused to allow this, saying that he must remain in the sole character of an accuser. Many of the Oriental bishops also interrupted the reading of these acts with exclamations about the violence which they had suffered from Dioscorus, and when the latter pleaded in excuse that all that had passed at the council was with the consent of those present, the bishops exclaimed with vehemence against his assertion, declaring that they had been forced, and even beaten, and threatened with banishment; that soldiers had repulsed them when they desired to depart, and that they had, in fact, been compelled to sign a blank paper.

After this, the acts of the Council of Constantinople were read, which were inserted in those of the pseudo-council of Ephesus. Among others they read the second letter of Cyril to Nestorius, and that which he had written to the Eastern Church; these being ended, the bishops unanimously exclaimed that they contained their own belief and their own doctrine, and as Flavianus had approved these two letters in the Council of Constantinople, the legates, with Maximus of Antioch and Eustachius of Berythus, declared that in their opinion the faith of Flavianus was strictly in accordance with the true faith and the letter of Cyril. The Eastern bishops, also with one voice, agreed that Flavianus had truly asserted the Catholic faith, and at the same time the bishops of Palestine passed over from the right hand to the side on the left of the imperial officer, to testify that they abandoned the Egyptian party. Thus the innocence of Flavianus was established, and, at the same time, necessarily, the pseudo-council of Ephesus condemned, none of the bishops who had taken any share in the proceedings attempting to defend themselves. But although every one declared himself in favor of Flavianus, Dioscorus did not in the slightest degree abate his arrogance, declaring that for his part he belonged to no party, and professed no faith but the Catholic and apostolic faith; neither did he regard men, but God alone.

After this, the opinion which Eustachius of Berythus had delivered at the Council of Ephesus came under consideration, maintaining that it is an error to believe in two natures in our Lord Jesus Christ, and that the right faith is, that there is in him but one nature incarnate. This opinion was unanimously condemned. In the third place the confession of Eutyches, which had been approved by Dioscorus at the Council of Ephesus, was read; in it he declared his belief that in our Lord were two natures before his incarnation, and but one afterwards. This opinion was at once anathematized by the fathers in council.

On this day the acts of the first session only of the pseudo-council at Ephesus were read.

In the second session Dioscorus, Juvenal, Thalassius, Eusebius, and Basil were absent. The bishops were now entrained on the part of the emperor to decide matters relating to the faith, in order to settle the minds of those who had been led astray. They replied that a new exposition of the faith was not needed, but that the fathers had left a sufficient exposition of the true faith, which they ought to follow, and that the letter of Leo, which all the bishops in the council had already subscribed, was a sufficient antidote to the heresy of Eutyches.

The bishops of Illyria and Palestine earnestly desired that pardon should be granted to the chiefs of the pseudo-council at Ephesus, specially naming Dioscorus. The Eastern bishops, however, without taking notice of the others, insisted upon the banishment of Dioscorus.

The third session was held on the 13th of October, at which the officers of the emperor were not present; probably, as Tillemont says, in order that it might not be said that the bishops were not permitted to pass a free judgment upon Dioscorus.

The petition of Eusebius was read, in which he demanded that, Dioscorus having now been convicted of many crimes, the council should anathematize his impious dogmas; that it should punish him according to his deserts; that it should confirm the true faith, and annul all that had been done in the false Council of Ephesus; he also requested that Dioscorus should be cited before the council to answer him, and this was accordingly done; but Dioscorus, upon various pretexts, refused to appear. The petitions of the clergy and laity of Alexandria against Dioscorus were then read, in which they accused him of grievous crimes, stating that he had been guilty of homicide, had burned and pulled down houses, had lived an infamous life, had bought up corn in order to enhance the price, and had convived at the residence of women of ill-fame in his diocese, and had even kept them in his own home. After this, Dioscorus was cited a third time to appear, but with as little success as before; and the deputies having made their report to the council, the legate, in a few words, enumerated the crimes of which Dioscorus had been convicted, and declared him to be deprived by themselves, acting for the pope, and by the council, of his episcopal office, and of all his ecclesiastical dignities. After this, they requested the council to make a decree conformable to the canons of the Church, and accordingly each of the bishops present condemned Dioscorus, and the sentence being committed to writing, they all signed it, the whole number of signatures amounting to three hundred. They then drew up an act to signify to Dioscorus the judgment passed against him, and a letter to the emperor, informing him of the causes which compelled them to depose Dioscorus.

At the fourth session, Oct. 17, the emperor's officers were again present, and perceiving that the bishops were averse to drawing up any new definition of the faith, they contented themselves with demanding whether they accepted the letter of Leo as agreeing with the creeds of Nicæa and Constantinople. Pachasinus declared it to be the faith of the council, and that they held to the definition of Nicæa, and that of Constantinople, under Theodosius, as also to the exposition of Cyril, and to the writings of Leo against the heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches.

After this, the bishops Juvenal, Thalassius, Eusebius, Basil, and Eustachius having made open profession of the true faith, were absolved by the unanimous vote of the council, which considered that the deposition of Dioscorus ought to suffice, and that matters should not be pushed too far, for fear of originating a fresh schism.

Some other matters of minor importance were also transacted in this session.

Fifth session, Oct. 22. Although the bishops had before expressed an unwillingness to draw up any new definition of the faith, they, upon further consideration, resolved to do so, endeavoring, however, to follow exactly all that had previously been decided by the fathers. They resolved that the definition of the faith as to the matter in question should be examined into, and they appointed a committee of twenty-two, who assembled in the oratory of Euphemius. Having accordingly examined the existing definition of the faith, they proceeded to draw up a new form, in which, however, several bishops objected to the expression that Jesus Christ was of two natures, and not in two natures, which, although strictly speaking true, yet was such a definition as the Eutychians could have received as well as the Catholics; after many difficulties and much discussion, they agreed to follow exactly the letter of Leo, and the decree containing the definition was accordingly altered, and, in the end, accepted by the whole Church. This decree is not in the form of a creed, brief and abridged, but rather of a long discourse, in which both the Nicene and Constantinopolitan creeds are inserted; the two letters of Cyril against Nestorius were added to it, and also that of Leo to Flavianus against the errors of Nestorius and Eutyches.

When this decree was read, the bishops, with one voice, cried out that it contained the faith of the fathers, and it was unanimously received by them, to the number of three hundred and fifty-six. The council then forbade any one to hold or teach any other faith, upon pain, if a bishop or clergyman, of being deposed, if a monk or layman, of being anathematized.

At the sixth session, Oct. 25, the emperor was present in person, and delivered a speech in Latin, in which he unfolded what had been his intentions in convoking the council, and declared that his sole motive in attending it was to give his assistance in settling the true faith, and not at all to hinder the freedom of their deliberations. Then the above-mentioned decree was read, upon which the emperor asked if the council was agreed as to this confession, and the bishops unanimously declaring that they were so, severally subscribed it.

This done, the emperor declared his will that the city of Chalcedon, in which the council had been held, should thenceforward enjoy the privileges of a metropolitan see; saving the dignity of the metropolitan of Nicomedia.

In the seventh session the arrangements which Maximus of Antioch and Juvenal of Jerusalem had made upon certain disputes connected with their sees were ratified.

In the eighth session Theodoret was re-established in his church, having pronounced anathema against Nestorius, and subscribed the letter of Leo.

In the ninth session the case of Ibas, bishop of Edessa, was considered, who complained of having been persecuted by Eutyches, and deposed in the pseudo-council of Ephesus in his absence.

These three sessions appear to have been held on the same day, viz. Oct. 26.

In the tenth session, Oct. 27, Ibas was pronounced to be orthodox, and his re-establishment in his see ordered.

In the eleventh session, Oct. 29, Bassianus, bishop of Ephesus, was declared to have intruded into that see, having obtained his chair by violence; and Stephen, who also pretended to the same bishopric, was similarly condemned: it was, therefore, decreed, that it was necessary to proceed to a fresh election.

In the twelfth session, Oct. 30, it was decreed, that although Stephen and Bassianus should be deprived of the see of Ephesus, the rank of bishop should not be taken from them, and that they should receive a maintenance out of the revenues of that Church.

In the thirteenth session, on the same day, it was decreed that the bishop of Nicomedia should have the authority of metropolitan over the churches of Bithynia, and that the bishop of Nicæa should have metropolitan honor only, and submit to the see of Nicomedia.

In the fourteenth session, Oct. 31, judgment was pronounced in the difference between Sabianus, bishop of Persæ, in Syria, and Anastasius, who was also bishop of the same city, but who had been deposed, and afterwards replaced in the chair: it was ordered that Anastasius should continue to enjoy the see in peace until the matter should be thoroughly sifted by Maximus of Antioch in a synod.

In this session, Oct. 31, twenty-eight canons were published.

1. Confirms all canons before made by the fathers in different councils (answering to the code of the whole Church, or, rather, of the Greek Church, published by Juſtel, and containing one hundred and ſeventy canons, taken from the councils of Nicæa, Ancyra, Neo-Cæſarea, Gangra, Antioch, Laodicea, and Conſtantinople].

2. Declares that if a biſhop ſhall receive any money, etc., in conſideration of conferring orders, both he and the perſon ſo ordained ſhall be depoſed; and that any perſon acting in any way as the intermediate party on the occaſion ſhall, if a clerk, be depoſed; if a monk or a layman, be anathematized.

3. Forbids any eccleſiaſtic or monk to undertake the management or ſtewardſhip of the property of others, or intrude himſelf into worldly miniſtrations. Among a few other exceptions, however, it is permitted to them to undertake the care of the property of orphans and widows, and other afflicted perſons, with the biſhop's conſent.

4. Forbids the erection of any monaſtery or oratory without the permission of the biſhop of the dioceſe. Orders all monks to ſubmit to the biſhop of the dioceſe, and not to meddle in any eccleſiaſtical or civil matters, unleſs they be permitted to do ſo for ſome neceſſary purpoſe by their biſhop. Laſtly, orders all biſhops to keep watch over the conduct of the monks within their dioceſes; offenders to be excommunicated.

5. Renews the prohibition made in a former council, forbidding the biſhop or clergy of one church to quit their own church in order to go and ſerve in another.

6. Forbids a biſhop to ordain a clerk unleſs he is, bonæ fide, intended to ſerve in ſome particular church or chapel or monaſtery, and declares all ordinations not made in accordance with this law to be null and void.

7. Forbids, under pain of anathema, thoſe who have been ordained, or who have entered a ſtate of monkhood, to quit their ſtate.

8. Enjoins the clergy attached to all monaſteries, chapels of martyrs, hospitals, etc., to ſubmit to their biſhops; offenders to be excommunicated.

9. Orders that all diſputes among the clergy ſhall be ſettled before their biſhop, and in no ſecular court, except by his permiſſion. That if a diſpute ariſe between a biſhop and one of the clergy, it ſhall be judged in the provincial council. That all diſputes between a biſhop or clergyman and his metropolitane ſhall be brought before the exarch of the dioceſis [i. e. the patriarch] or the biſhop of Conſtantinople.

10. Absolutely forbids a clergyman to be on the liſt of the church of two cities at the ſame time, and orders that ſuch an act ſhall be reſtored to the church in which they were firſt ordained.

11. Orders that letters of peace (or of communion) be given to poor perſons going abroad, after examination; and that letters commendatory be given to thoſe perſons only who are liable to ſuſpicion.

12. Forbids any biſhop, under pain of depoſition, to divide the province, by obtaining letters-patent from the emperor, erecting his biſhopric into a metropolitane ſee.

13. Forbids that a foreign or unknown eccleſiaſtic be permitted to exerciſe any function in the church, except he bring letters commendatory from his biſhop.

14. Forbids the lower orders of eccleſiaſtics (readers, chanters, etc.), to whom it was permitted to marry, to marry Jeweſſes, or pagan, or heretical women, except they ſhould promiſe to become Chriſtians.

15. Forbids the ordination of a deaconess under forty years of age; if after ordination ſhe ſhall marry, ſhe ſhall be anathematized with her huſband.

16. Orders that virgins marrying after having conſecrated themſelves to God be ſeparated from communion for as long a period as the biſhop ſhall deem proper.

17. Makes over to the biſhop forever pariſhes in the country over which he has exerciſed juriſdiction for thirty years.

18. Depoſes thoſe of the clergy or monks who form cabals againſt their biſhop or any of their fellow-clergy.

19. Renews the decree of the Council of Nicæa, which directs that provincial councils be held twice in every year; and enjoins that biſhops who wilfully neglect to attend ſhall be reprov'd.

20. Directs that if any biſhop ſhall receive a clergyman belonging to another biſhop, both the biſhop and the clergyman ſhall be ſeparated from communion until the ſaid clergyman ſhall return to his own biſhop.

21. Forbids the receiving of an accuſation againſt a clergyman from any perſon without firſt inquiring into his character.

22. Forbids the clergy to take poſſeſſion of the property of their biſhop after his deceaſe, under pain of loſing their rank.

23. Directs that the defender of the Church of Conſtantinople ſhall drive out of the city all ſtrange clergy or monks, coming there without letters from their biſhop, and cauſing trouble and diſturbance.

24. Orders that houſes which have once been erected into monaſteries, and conſecrated, ſhall ever after be devoted to the ſame purpoſe.

25. Directs that the metropolitane ſhall conſecrate to a vacant biſhopric within three months after the death of the biſhop.

26. Directs that in every dioceſe there ſhall be a ſteward (œconomus) choſen from among the clergy, who ſhall manage the property of the Church according to the biſhop's directions.

27. Anathematizes thoſe who have been guilty of rape or abduction, and all who have aided and abetted in theſe crimes, or who have conſented to them; if any one of the clergy be among the guilty, he ſhall be depoſed.

28. "We, following in all things the deciſions of the holy fathers, and acknowledging the canon of the one hundred and fifty moſt religious biſhops, which has juſt been read, do alſo determine and decree the ſame things reſpecting the privileges of the moſt holy city of Conſtantinople, the new Rome. For the fathers properly gave the primacy to the throne of the elder Rome, becauſe that was the imperial city. And the one hundred and fifty moſt religious biſhops, being moved with the ſame intention, gave equal privileges to the moſt holy throne of new Rome; judging, with reaſon, that the city which was honored with the ſovereignty and ſenate, and which enjoyed equal privileges with the elder royal Rome, ſhould alſo be magnified, like her, in eccleſiaſtical matters, and be ſecond after her. And (we decree) that the metropolitans only of the Pontic, Aſian, and Thracian dioceſes, and, moreover, the biſhops of the aforeſaid dioceſes who are among the barbarians, ſhall be ordained by the above-mentioned throne of the moſt holy Church of Conſtantinople; each metropolitane of the aforeſaid dioceſes ordaining the biſhops of the provinces, as has been declared by the divine canons; but the metropolitans themſelves of the ſaid dioceſes ſhall, as has been ſaid, be ordained by the biſhop of Conſtantinople, the proper elections being made according to cuſtom, and reported to him."

It appears that the Roman legates had reſuſed to be preſent when this laſt canon was carried; however, immediately after they called for an aſſembly of the council, and proteſted againſt it, alleging that it was contrary to the ſixth canon of the council of Nicæa, which, as they aſſerted, commenced with theſe words, "The Roman ſee hath always had the primacy;" this, however, was ſhown to be only an interpolation, and after it had been proved that all things had been done rightly and canonically, the imperial judges delivered their opinion, which was to the effect, "that granting to the biſhop of ancient Rome, according to the canons, the primacy and prerogative of honor, the biſhop of Conſtantinople ought nevertheless to enjoy the ſame eccleſiaſtical privileges of honor, and that he ſhould have the right of conſecrating metropolitans in the dioceſes of Aſia, Pontus, and Thrace."

See Labbe, Concil. iv. 1-1003.

Chalcedonius was abbot (probably the firſt) of Vi-viers, one of the twin monaſteries eſtabliſhed by Caſſiodorus, A.D. cir. 469-563.

Chalchihuitlicue, in Mexican mythology, was the goddess of water. As water appears in various forms, this goddess also had different names, which designated the attributes in each case. In honor of the goddesses of the water and of the mountains there were five festivals, at which numerous human sacrifices were always offered, especially prisoners of war.

Chalcidia was a Christian lady, residing probably at Antioch, to whom Chrysostom addressed several letters during his exile, expressing the most affectionate solicitude for her health, which was very feeble, and for the troubles brought upon her by her fidelity to his cause. These letters are sometimes addressed to Chalcidia separately, sometimes conjointly with her friend Asyncretia.

Chalciœcia, in Greek religion, was a festival among the Spartans in honor of Minerva. It was celebrated in a brazen temple, where her image of brass stood. Armed youths brought her sacrifices.

Chaldæan Mythology. The following is the pedigree of the Chaldæan pantheon:

Chalemot, a French theologian, lived in the latter part of the 17th century. He belonged to the Cistercian order, and wrote, Serius Sanctorum et Beatorum ac Illustrum Virorum Ordinis Cisterciensis (Paris, 1670, 4to).—Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chalgrin, JEAN FRANÇOIS THÉRÈSE, an eminent French architect, was born at Paris in 1739, and studied under Moreau and Boulet. Having gained the grand prize of the academy, he went to Italy, but soon returned to Paris. Among his principal works is the Church of St. Philippe du Roule, and the Triumphal Arc de l'Étoile. He died Jan. 20, 1811. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Chalice. Of this important ecclesiastical vessel we give the following additional particulars, which serve to illustrate their various forms and applications:

1. Kinds.—There were four principal sorts of chalices: (1) communal, that used by the celebrant; (2) ministerial, large and small, for communicating the faithful; (3) offertory, in which the deacons received the wine offered by communicants; possibly the chalices found in tombs of the catacombs were those into which the deacon poured the wine, and were religiously preserved for burial with their late owners; (4) baptismal, used for communion in the case of the newly baptized, and for administering to them milk and honey.

At that early period, when the administration of the Eucharist was connected, both as regards time and locality, with the feasts of charity (agapæ), the distinction between the vessels used for each purpose was less strongly drawn than afterwards came to be the case, and in the earliest centuries there was little or no distinction of either form or decoration between the Eucharistic cup and that of the domestic table.

Besides the chalices actually used in the rites of the church, vessels called "calices" were suspended from the arches of the ciborium and even from the intercolumniations of the nave and other parts of the church as ornaments. Many of these were, however, most probably cups or vases, not such as would have been used for the administration or consecration of the Eucharist. The ansate in the 6th century, being of great weight, were often suspended by chains above the altar.

Suspended Chalices.

II. Form and Position.—In a chalice there are four parts—the foot, the stem, the knob, and the bowl. The foot should extend considerably beyond the bowl, to prevent the possibility of its being upset. On one division of the foot it is usual to engrave a representation of our Lord's Passion, which should always be turned towards the celebrant. The stem unites the foot to the bowl, and on it is fixed the knob for the convenience of holding the chalice. The knob is often enriched with enamel, jewels, tracery, and tabernacle-work, while the stem is frequently engraved or enamelled. The height of the stem is generally about four inches, and seldom exceeds six. The bowl should vary from three to six inches in dimension, and be of a proportionate depth; it should have a plain rim of about an inch, below which it may be enriched with engravings, inscriptions, and chasings. The chalice should never have turn-over lips, which are extremely liable to cause accident in communicating.

In mediæval chalices the pomel, or knob, and foot were usually covered with niello-work, gems, and elaborate chasings.

The foot was indented in order to keep it steady when laid down to drain upon the paten, according to ancient usage, before the affusions were drunk by the priest, or at the commencement of mass. At York the curves are wanting, but in one case the foot has a crucifix. Until the 12th century the communion was given in both kinds, but subsequent to that date the chalice was administered only to the celebrant and his acolytes; the vessel, therefore, which had previously been of large dimensions, for the use of all the faithful, and was provided with two handles, shrank into a cup-like form about that period in the Western Church. The Greeks retain communion in both kinds, and consequently the two-handled chalice. Several of this shape are still preserved in the treasury of St. Mark's, Venice. In the 11th and 12th centuries the stalk was short, the foot large, the knob in the centre thick, the bowl wide; after that the cup became small, the stalk long, and the knob tall and flat, and in some cases enriched with tabernacled figures of saints. In the 15th century it underwent a further modification, the knob became diamond-shaped in profile, the cup more long and shallow, and the foot indented, like the petals of a flower.

According to Alexander of Hales and Leo of Chartres the chalice should stand on the right side of the paten, but by the Salisbury use it is placed behind it.

III. Use.—In 413 pope Zosimus restrained the use of the chalice to the cells of the faithful and of clerks. Pope Martin V gave it to the Roman people, and the Council of Basle permitted it to the Bohemians. The emperor of Constantinople, at his coronation, partook of the chalice; and Clement VI allowed the king of Gaul to partake at pleasure, although other princes were permitted the privilege only at their coronation and at the hour of death. The pope, at solemn celebration, communicates the cardinal deacon with the chalice. The monks of St. Bernard dipped the bread in the wine. Pope Victor III and the emperor Henry of Luxembourg are said to have been poisoned by the chalice.

The denial of the cup to the laity by the Roman Church was introduced at the close of the 12th century, and confirmed in 1414 by the Council of Constance.

IV. Materials and Specimens.—It has been asserted that in the apostolic age chalices of wood were in use; but for this assertion there is no early authority. Glass was no doubt in use from a very early date. Pope Zephyrinus, cir. 202, ordered the material to be glass; and St. Jerome speaks of a bishop of Toulouse who bore the Lord's body in a wicker canister and his blood in glass. Tertullian also alludes to the latter material. Wooden chalices were in use until the 9th century. St. Boniface said, when permitting their use: "Once golden priests used wooden chalices; now; on the contrary, wooden priests use golden chalices." The Council of Rheims, in 226, forbade glass, and in 883 the use of wood, tin, glass, and copper. Pope Leo IV,

Modern Chalice.

in 847, prohibited wood or glass; the Council of Tribur, in 897, proscribed wood; the Council of Cealchythe, in 785, forbade wood; but Ælfrie's canons, in 957, allowed wood, probably owing to the devastations of the Danes; yet, three years later, king Edgar's canons allowed only molten metal. Honorius, Cæsarius of Arles, and St. Benedict used, or at least mention, glass chalices, which certainly were not disused in the 8th century. Glass was considered improper, owing to its fragility; horn, from blood entering into its composition, by the Council of Cealchythe; wood, from its porousness and absorbent nature; and brass and bronze, because liable to rust. In 1222 the Archbishop of Canterbury forbade tin or pewter; but tin was used in France so lately as 1793, and by the canons of 1604 the wine was to be brought in "a clean and sweet standing pot or stoup of pewter, if not of purer metal." The most precious metals and materials were, however, at an early date used. Onyx, ivory, sardonyx, and agate are mentioned by early French writers; marble is spoken of by Gregory of Tours; gold and silver are mentioned by St. Augustine; in 227 pope Urban required the latter; in the time of pope Gregory II chalices were jewelled, and Tertullian mentions that they had carvings of the Good Shepherd; from the 6th to the 13th century their handles were sculptured with animals or foliage, and blue, red, and green enamel was used in their ornamentation. At Clairvaux, St. Malachy's chalice was surrounded with little bells; one at Rheims, of gold, was inscribed with an anathema, imprecated upon any person who should steal it. Sometimes the maker's name was engraved upon it; one, formerly belonging to St. Alban's Abbey, is now at Trinity College, Oxford, and another ancient specimen, of the 12th century, at Chichester; three of early date are at York. Chalices of earthenware or pewter were buried in the grave with priests. There is a chalice, that of St. Remigius, of the 12th century, at Paris; St. Wolfgang's cup, cir. 994, and the chalice of Weintgarten are preserved at Ratisbon; another is at Mayence. There is a Jacobean chalice of wood at Goodrich Court, and a German chalice, of the 15th century, is in a case in the British Museum. There are several chalices still preserved, one of ivory and silver, of the 14th century, at Milan; that of Rheims, of gold, with enamel and gems, of the 12th century, now in the Imperial Library at Rome; that of Troyes, cir. 1220; and one of Cologne, of the 13th century, with the apostles under niches below the rim—sometimes sacred subjects from the life of our Lord adorn the base; another at St. Gereon's, of the 15th century, has only an arabesque pattern; but a beautiful specimen at Hildesheim, of the 13th century, represents, in compartments, the offering of a lamb by Abel, Melchisedek's oblation of wine, the brazen serpent, and the bunch of grapes from Eshcol. The use of bronze is exceptional, and perhaps peculiar to the Irish monks, probably because of the tradition that our Saviour was affixed to the cross by nails of this make. This traditional use of bronze was no doubt continued by the successors of the Irish missionaries in the south of Germany, and explains why the Kremsmünster chalice is of that material. The precious metals were, however, from a very early, perhaps the earliest, period most probably the usual material of the chalice. We have at least proof of the use of both gold and silver in the sacred vessels in the beginning of the 4th century, for we are told by Optatus of Milevi that in the Diocletian persecution the Church of Carthage possessed many "ornamenta" of gold and silver (Opt. Mil. De Schism. Donat. i, 17). The Church of Ciria in Numidia at the same time possessed two golden and six silver chalices (Gesta. Purgat. Cæciliani, in the Works of Optatus). Many instances of gifts of chalices of the precious metals to the churches of Rome by successive popes are to be found in the Lib. Pont. Of these the following may deserve special mention; a great chalice

(calix major) with handles and adorned with gems, weighing fifty-eight pounds; a great chalice with a syphon (cum scyphone) or tube, weighing thirty-six pounds; a covered (spanoclystus, i. e. ἵπανωκλυστος) chalice of gold, weighing thirty-two pounds; all three given by pope Leo III (756).

The earliest chalice still existing is probably that found, with a paten, at Gourdon, in France. This is of gold ornamented with thin slices of garnets. With it were found one hundred and four gold coins of emperors of the East; twenty-five of Justin I (518-527), in a fresh condition and unworn, were the latest in date. The deposit was, therefore, probably made in the early part of the 6th century. Of not much later date were the splendid chalices belonging to the basilica of Monza, no longer in existence, but of which representations, evidently tolerably accurate, have been preserved in a large painting probably executed in the latter half of the 15th century, and now in the library of that church. These chalices were both of gold, set with jewels, and their weight is variously stated at from one hundred and five to one hundred and seventy ounces. There is ground for believing that these chalices were in possession of the Church of Monza before A.D. 600. In the sacristy of the Church of Santa Anastasia at Rome a chalice is preserved as a relic, as it is said to have been used by St. Jerome; the bowl is of white opaque glass with some ornament in relief, the foot is of metal. A chalice is preserved (? at Maestricht), which is believed to have belonged to St. Lambert, bishop of that city (ob. 708); it is of metal (? silver) gilt, the bowl hemispherical, the foot a frustum of a cone; the whole without ornament. A chalice of exactly the same form is to be seen in an illumination in the very ancient Gospels preserved in the library of Corpus Christi College at Cambridge, and known as St. Augustine's. Until the year 1792 the Abbey of Chelles, in the diocese of Paris, possessed a most splendid example of a golden chalice, which ancient inventories asserted to have been the work of St. Eligius, and therefore to date from the first half of the 7th century. An engraving of it has been preserved, and the character of the work corresponds with the alleged date. It is obviously an instance of transition from earlier to later forms, though somewhat exceptional from the great depth of the bowl. It was about a foot high and nearly ten inches in diameter. A singular exception in point of form was the chalice found with the body of St. Cuthbert when his relics were examined in the year 1104; this was of small size and in its lower part of gold and of the figure of a lion, the bowl, which was attached to the back of the lion, being cut from an onyx. This was probably not made for a chalice, but had been presented to him and converted to that use. Of the 8th century, a very remarkable example still exists in the convent of Kremsmünster, in Upper Austria; this chalice is of bronze ornamented with niello and incrustations of silver. As the inscription shows that it was the gift of Tassilo, duke of Bavaria, it is probably earlier than A.D. 788. One of the bass-reliefs of the altar of St. Ambrogio at Milan (finished in 635) gives a good example of the form of a chalice in the beginning of the 9th century. It has a bowl, foot, and end handles.

Chalice, ABLUTION OF. See PURIFICATION.

Chalice-cover is a lid or covering for a chalice. Anciently, chalices were without covers, the paten being slightly indented, so as to form a cover. At the period of the Reformation covered chalices came into use, and so continued for a considerable period.

Chalice-pall is a covering for a chalice when in use. This is commonly made of a piece of stiff cardboard, covered with silk on the top, and with lawn underneath, and is placed on the chalice after the consecration.

Chalice-veil is a lawn or linen cover for the chalice, used after the communion, about twelve inches square, mentioned in the English Prayer-book as a "fair white linen cloth."

Chalippe, LOUIS FRANÇOIS CANDIDE, a French theologian, of the order of the Récollets, was born at Paris in 1684, and died there in 1757. There remain of his writings, Oraison Funèbre du Cardinal de Mailly (Paris, 1722, 4to) :—Vie de Saint François d'Assise (ibid. 1727, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chalitsah (Heb. חָלִיצָה, a snatching) is the ceremony among the Jews called "the loosing of the shoe," which is performed when a man refuses to marry his brother's widow, and to raise up seed to his brother. It is done in pursuance of the ordinance in Deut. xxv, 9, 10, and is performed in the following manner: Three rabbis go out on the preceding evening, and agree upon a proper spot where the transaction is to take place. Next day, at the close of the morning service, the congregation repair to the place agreed upon, and the widow and brother-in-law present themselves before the assembly and make a public declaration that the object of their appearance is to procure their freedom and discharge. The principal rabbi examines the man, argues with him, and endeavors to prevail upon him to marry his brother's widow. After a second examination, if he still refuse, he puts on a shoe which is too large for him, and the woman, attended by one of the rabbis, repeats Deut. xxv, 7, "And if the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate unto the elders, and say, My husband's brother refuseth to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel, he will not perform the duty of my husband's brother." Whereupon the brother-in-law replies, "I like not to take her;" then the woman looses the shoe and takes it off, throwing it upon the ground with the utmost anger and disclaim, repeating, with the assistance of the rabbi, "So shall it be done unto the man that will not build up his brother's house. And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed." She repeats this form of words three times, and each time the witnesses reply, "His shoe is loosed." The rabbi now informs the widow that she is at liberty to marry whom she pleases, and a certificate of the fact is given her if she desires it. The permission to marry is called by the Jews chalitsah or caliza. The custom here described is seldom followed by modern Jews; but when they marry a daughter to one of several brothers, they are in the habit of requiring a contract that, in case of her husband's decease, the widow shall be set at liberty without any ceremony. Some will even oblige the husband, if he happen to become dangerously ill, to grant his wife a divorce, that her brother-in-law, after her husband's decease, may have no claims on her. See LEVIRATE.

Chalker, ISAAC, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Connecticut. He graduated from Yale College in 1728, and was ordained in 1734 by the East Jersey

Presbytery pastor of Bethlehem and Walkill, in the Highlands of New York. In 1743 he left the bounds of the synod, and in 1744 settled at Eastbury, Conn., where he remained till 1760. He died May 28, 1765. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in America, 1857. (J. C. S.)

Chalkley, Thomas, a minister in the Society of Friends, was born in Southwark, London, March 3, 1685. He came to Pennsylvania about 1701. A part of his time was devoted to trade, but when he felt what he believed to be the movings of the Spirit, he went where Providence seemed to direct him to preach the Gospel. He made a trip through Great Britain, Holland, and Germany, returning to America in 1710. In 1716 he visited the Bermuda Islands, the Barbadoes and Great Britain again in 1718. He died on the island of Tortola, Sept. 4, 1740, while on one of his evangelical errands. He is said to have been a man of many virtues, and was endeared to his acquaintances by the gentleness of his manners. He laid the foundation for the valuable library of the Friends in Philadelphia. A collection of his writings and his journal were published in Philadelphia in 1749, and in New York in 1808. (J. C. S.)

Challe, Charles Michel Ange, a French artist, was born at Paris, March 18, 1718. He gained no great reputation as a painter, but attained sufficient distinction as an architect and mathematician to be chosen an academicien in 1753, and professor the same year. He painted several works, among which was a picture in the Church of St. Hippolyte, representing the priests congratulating that saint on his conversion. He died at Paris, Jan. 8, 1778. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Challia, James, an English divine and scholar, was born in 1803, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1825 as senior wrangler. He was ordained in 1830, and in 1836 was appointed professor of astronomy and experimental philosophy in Cambridge University, and director; positions which he held until his death, Dec. 4, 1882. In 1861 he published Creation in Plan and Progress, a reply to Charles Wycliffe Goodwin's treatise on the Mosaic cosmogony in the celebrated Essays and Reviews. He was also the author of twelve volumes of astronomical observations and of many scientific papers.

Challia, James M., a Baptist minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 4, 1779. He united with the Church in Salem, N. J., which gave him a license to preach. After studying for a short time with Rev. Dr. Holcombe of Philadelphia, he was ordained in 1822 pastor of the Church at Upper Freehold, N. J., and remained there till 1830, when he went to Lower Dublin, Pa. Of this Church he was pastor till 1840, and then he returned to New Jersey. He was pastor of the Church in Cohansey till 1850, when he resigned and removed to Bridgeton. He died there in April, 1868. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 198. (J. C. S.)

Chalmer is the early form of the frequent Scotch name CHALMERS, and hence both appear in the same family below.

Chalmer, Alexander, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1695; called to the living at Forteviot in 1696, and ordained, and died before Feb. 17, 1697. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 641.

Chalmer, George (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, originally of Barra as first Protestant minister, was transferred to Crimond before 1596, and to Botarie before 1599, having Gartly in his charge before 1608. He was named as constant moderator by the General Assembly of 1606, and transferred to Kinore and Dumbennan before 1614. He adhered to the protestation for the liberties of the Kirk in 1617, with fifty-four other ministers, and died before Oct. 24, 1626, aged about fifty-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 189, 624.

Chalmer, George (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1592; was appointed to the living at Barra, but the parishioners would not receive him; nevertheless he continued there in August, 1594. He was pursued by Will Hay, a rebel, who would have slain him with a pistol, but by his rapid flight he secured safety within the gates of Haddington. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 332.

Chalmer, George (3), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1620; became schoolmaster at Inveraven, having no salary; was licensed to preach in 1642, and ordained minister at Rhynie the same year. He died after April 3, 1660, having two sons, George and Hugh, in the ministry. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 212.

Chalmer, William (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1634; was appointed to the living at Knockando in 1641. The inhabitants of Botriphnie petitioned him to become their pastor in May, 1652. He died April 7, 1668, aged about fifty-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 223.

Chalmer, William (2), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Boyndie, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1640; was admitted to the living at Marykirk in 1648; was transferred to Fettercairn in 1665, and went to London, where he died in 1669, aged about forty-nine years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 866, 880.

Chalmer, William (3), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Fettercairn, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1656; was licensed to preach in 1670, and admitted to the living at Bervie in the same year; transferred to Glamis in 1674, and died in March, 1681, aged about forty-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 770, 859.

Chalmer, William (4), a Scotch clergyman, was admitted to the living at Gartly in 1666; conformed to the Presbyterian government, was received into communion by the Assembly in 1694, transferred to Rathven in 1699, thence to Kinedar in 1704, and died in 1718. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 197, 662, 678.

Chalmer, William (5), a Scotch clergyman, retired from Episcopacy in 1687; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery in 1691, and called the same month to the living at Monzie, and ordained. English and Gaelic being spoken by the people, he had difficulty there, not knowing both, and was transferred to Muthil in 1702, but returned to Monzie. It had long been the custom of many of his parishioners to play at foot-ball on the Sabbath morning, so he had great difficulty in getting their attendance at the church; but by taking part with them occasionally, he at length prevailed on them to accompany him to the sanctuary. He was transferred to Dunkeld and Dowally in 1705, and thence to Kinloch in 1718. He died Dec. 30, 1742. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 774, 787, 808.

Chalmers, Alexander (1), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Marnoch, was licensed to preach in 1706; called to the living at Marnoch, as successor to his father, in 1707, and ordained. He died Feb. 20, 1752, leaving a son, John, principal of King's College, Aberdeen. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 208.

Chalmers, Alexander (2), a Scotch clergyman, son of George, the minister at Botriphnie, was called to the living at Glass in 1734; ordained in 1735; and died April 7, 1756. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 199.

Chalmers, Alexander (3), a Scotch clergyman, studied at Marischal College, Aberdeen; was licensed to preach in 1746; and presented to the living at Cairn in 1747. He was appointed chaplain to the 88th Foot in 1759; obtained an augmentation of stipend in 1794, and died Oct. 2, 1798, aged seventy-seven years. He was highly esteemed for his attention to parochial duty, and his benevolence to the poor in his parish. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 195.

Chalmers, Daniel, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of a burghess of Edinburgh, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1582; was presented to the vicarage of Barra in 1586; called to be a reader in the king's house in 1589, and re-entered on the living of Barra in 1592. He was summoned before the Assembly to answer for non-residence in the parish, and resigned in 1593. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 332.

Chalmers, George (1), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Aberdeen, took his degree at King's College in 1674; was admitted to the living at Kennoway before 1685; was deprived by the privy council in 1689 for not praying for the king and queen, and other acts of disloyalty. He went to England, and was presented to the living at Ford in 1690. He died in January, 1722, aged about sixty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 541.

Chalmers, George (2), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1678; called to the living at Bortriphnie in 1682; survived the Revolution and most of his contemporaries, and died Feb. 24, 1727, aged seventy-two years, leaving two sons, Alexander and James, in the ministry. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 193.

Chalmers, George (3), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Rhyrie, was admitted to the living at Drumblade before 1687, and died in 1702. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 652.

Chalmers, George (4), a Scotch clergyman, principal of King's College, Aberdeen, was appointed to the living at Old Machar in 1729, which he held in conjunction, although opposed for some time, but reaffirmed in 1730. He died May 4, 1746, aged seventy-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 485, 486.

Chalmers, George (5), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1795; presented to the living at Mordington in 1804; ordained in 1805, and died Feb. 21, 1831, aged sixty-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 446.

Chalmers, Hugh, a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Rhyrie, was ordained helper at Marnoch in 1671; presented to the living by the king in 1680, and died June 6, 1707, leaving his son Alexander, who became his successor, and James, minister at Dyke. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 208.

Chalmers, James (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, was promoted from being regent at King's College, Aberdeen; admitted to the living at New Machar before 1651; transferred to Cullen in 1652; appointed by Parliament in 1662 one of the visitors to the University of Aberdeen, and the same year was called south by the bishop of St. Andrews, and was promoted to Dumfries in 1663. The privy council ordered that as he had been at great charges in caring for the king's interest in Church and State, he was to have the salary due to his predecessor (who had been deprived and imprisoned), as well as that from his former parish. He was transferred by the king to Paisley in 1667; continued Aug. 18, 1669, and died before Aug. 4, 1675, aged about fifty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 569; ii, 197; iii, 508, 673.

Chalmers, James (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1682; was appointed minister at Kirkpatrick-Fleming in 1686, and deprived by the privy council in 1689 for not praying for the king and queen. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 622.

Chalmers, James (3), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Fettercairn, was admitted to the living at Cullen in 1689, and deprived in 1695 for non-jurancy. He was the last minister settled there under Episcopacy, which was abolished one month before his deprivation. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 673.

Chalmers, James (4), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1698; was licensed to preach in 1699; called to the living at Elie in 1700, and ordained. He died Jan. 20, 1741, aged about sixty-three years. His son John succeeded to the benefice. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 425.

Chalmers, James (5), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Marnoch, studied at Marischal College, Aberdeen; was licensed to preach in 1709; appointed to the living at Dyke, and ordained, but for some years had no salary. He was transferred to the second charge at Aberdeen in 1726; the appointment was opposed, but the General Assembly, by a small majority, affirmed it. He was transferred to the living at Greyfriars Church in 1728, with the professorship of divinity at Marischal College in conjunction. He died Oct. 6, 1744, aged fifty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 181, 467, 475.

Chalmers, James (6), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1729; appointed to the living at Daviot in 1731, and died Aug. 3, 1787, aged eighty-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 581.

Chalmers, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, was minister at Auchterderran in 1599. He was one of the fifty-four ministers who signed the protestation in behalf of the liberties of the Kirk in 1617, and appeared before the Court of High Commission in 1620, for not keeping holy-days, and not administering the communion according to the Perth form, but owing to sickness he was excused. He died in 1642. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 521, 522.

Chalmers, John (2), a Scotch clergyman, sub-principal of King's College, Aberdeen, was appointed first to the living at Dyce, but was refused; then to the living of second charge, Old Machar, in 1601, which he held in conjunction. Objection was taken to his holding the two offices, as his charge was neglected, and he was transferred to Keith in June, 1610. In a fit of melancholy he attempted suicide, but survived a week, and died June 11, 1611, after full confession and repentance. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 205, 207, 486, 500.

Chalmers, John (3), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Kinore, entered bursar at Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1619; was admitted to the living at Inveraven in 1630, and ordained. The troubles of the rebellion and the Irish army prevented divine service for a long time, and to escape therefrom he was transferred to Gartly in 1649, where he was admitted in 1650, and continued in 1661. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 197, 221.

Chalmers, John (4), a Scotch clergyman, of Balnacrage, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1630; was appointed suffragan assistant and successor at Glenbervie in 1634, and died in April, 1635, aged about twenty-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 878.

Chalmers, John (5), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Boyndie, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1655, was appointed to the living at Arbuthnot in 1662, transferred to Peterhead in 1664, and died after Oct. 8, 1678. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 633, 855.

Chalmers, John (6), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, brother of the principal at Aberdeen, supplied the congregation at Rotterdam in 1698, during a vacancy; was admitted to the living at Campvere, Scotland, in 1699; transferred to Duffus in 1722, and died there in September, 1729. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 153.

Chalmers, John (7), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Elie, was licensed to preach in 1787; called to the living at Elie in 1788, in succession to his father, and ordained. He was transferred to Kilconquhar in 1760, though his settlement was the subject of a long debate in the General Assembly. He died April 7, 1791, in his eightieth year. He was superior to many for ancient learning, but his usefulness was marred by a species of buffoonery, which excited much prejudice against him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 425, 438.

Chalmers, John (8), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Annapolis, Md. He embraced religion when but a boy; began preaching before he was sixteen; and in 1788 entered the itinerancy. In 1797 he located; re-entered the Baltimore Conference in 1832 as a supernumerary, which relation he sustained until his death, June 3, 1833. Mr. Chalmers was zealous in his work and exemplary in his life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1834, p. 279.

Chalmers, Patrick, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1668; was admitted helper and successor to his father at Boyndie in 1671, and was deprived, on his own confession, for not praying for the king and queen, in 1689. He intruded into the living at Boyne in 1703. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 600, 671.

Chalmers, Peter, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1814; presented to the second charge at Dunfermline in 1817; and transferred to the first charge in 1836. He joined the Free Secession in May, 1843, but changed his mind, applied to the presbytery, and was again received in June. He was living in 1863. He published, Two Discourses on the Sin, Danger, and Remedy of Duelling (Edinb. 1822):—Strictures on the Dunfermline Voluntaries (Glasgow, 1835):—The Province of Reason in Matters of Divine Revelation and Scepticism Considered (1847):—An Historical Account of Dunfermline (Edinb. 1844-59, 2 vols.):—An Account of the Parish, etc. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 570, 572.

Chalmers, Thomas, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Moray, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1611; was proposed for the living at Livingston in 1616, but the absence of the patron caused delay in his admission. He was admitted minister at Kirkpatrick-Fleming in 1634; but was deposed in July, 1649, and died in February, 1673, aged about eighty-two years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 622.

Chalmers, Walter, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1766; appointed and ordained as missionary at Cairnie in 1768; then removed to Portsoy, and was presented to the living at Deskford in 1780. He died Dec. 20, 1828, aged eighty-three years. He published two single Sermons (1793, 1794). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 675.

Chalmers, William (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of the provost of Aberdeen, took his degree at King's College in that city in 1617; was admitted to the living at Boyndie before 1635, being the first minister of the separated parish. When the army of the Royalists, under Montrose, were plundering the country in 1645, they made spoil of his goods, gear, and books. He was a member of the Commission of Assemblies in 1647 and 1649, and died in February, 1671, aged about seventy-four years. He had four sons, James, John, Patrick, and William, in the ministry. Patrick succeeded him in the benefice. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 670, 671.

Chalmers, William (2), a Scotch clergyman, was baptized Feb. 17, 1755; licensed to preach in 1783; appointed to the living at Auchtergaven in 1784, and ordained. He died June 10, 1838, aged eighty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 790.

Chalmers, William (3), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1835; presented to the living at Aberdour in 1836 by desire of the parishioners, and ordained and transferred to Dailly in 1841. He joined the Free Secession in June, 1843, and was admitted minister to the Presbyterian congregation, Edward Street, London, in 1844. He published a sermon on the death of Sir Alexander Gibson Carmichael. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 576.

Chaloner, Edward, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1590, at Chiswick, in Middlesex, and graduated at Oxford in 1610. In 1611 he was chosen fellow of All-Souls, and soon after principal of Alban Hall. He died at Oxford, July 25, 1625. Some of his sermons were published at London in 1623, 1624, and 1629. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Châlons, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Cahilmense). Of these the following were provincial:

- I. Held A.D. 470, to elect John, bishop of Châlons.
- II. Held A.D. 579, to depose Salonius and Sagittarius, bishops respectively of Embrun and Gap, deposed by a previous council (of Lyons, A.D. 567), restored by Pope John III, and now again deposed.
- III. Held A.D. 594, to regulate the psalmody at the Church of St. Marcellus after the model of Agaune.
- IV. Held A.D. 603, to depose Desiderius, bishop of Vienne, at the instigation of Queen Brunichilde.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antig. s. v.
- V. Held Nov. 1, 649 (or 650, Le Comte says 694) by order of Clovis II; present, thirty-nine bishops, the deputies of six who were absent, six abbots, and one archdeacon. Agapius and Bobonus, bishops of Digne in Provence, were here deposed from the episcopate for violation of the canons. The council also drew up twenty canons:

1. Orders that the true faith, as taught by the Council of Nicaea and confirmed by that of Chalcedon, be observed.
4. Forbids the consecration of more than one bishop to the same church at the same time.
5. Forbids the laity to meddle in the administration of churches and church property.
14. Directs that the clergy who serve chapels shall be subject to the bishop in all things.
16. Is directed against simony.
19. Inflicts penalties upon lascivious dancers, and women who sang immodest songs within the church enclosure, on saints' days and festivals of dedication.

See Labbe, Concil. vi, 387.

VI. Held in 1062, by Peter d'Amiens, cardinal and legate, at the head of thirteen bishops. The subject of the council was the confirmation of the privileges of the Abbey of Clugny, which Drogon, bishop of Macon, had attacked. Peace was restored between him and the abbot. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 1177.

Chalucet, ARMAND LOUIS, Bonin de, a French prelate, was appointed bishop of Toulon in 1684, and consecrated in 1692. He displayed a rare courage when the armies of the allies, commanded by Victor Amadeo, duke of Savoy, came, in August, 1707, to besiege the city. Chalucet died in 1712, leaving some controversial works and excellent Ordonnances Synodales (Toulon, 1704, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chalvet, HYACINTHE DE, a French theologian, was born on Sept. 14, 1605, at Toulouse. He entered, when still quite young, the order of preaching friars, and followed the count of Romorantin to the aid of the city of Candia, which was besieged by the Turks. He stopped there for one year, and started, in September, 1648, to visit the holy places, but was taken captive by the infidels, and was not relieved until 1650. After returning to Toulouse, he printed the first volumes of his Theologus Ecclesiastes, a large work, of which the sixth volume was published at Caen, in 1659. He obtained, in 1662, the chair of theology at the university of that city, and occupied it for fourteen years, having a large concourse of auditors. Chalvet died at Toulouse, in 1688, leaving a work on the Grandeurs de Saint-Joseph, and another on the Avantages de Saint-Dominique. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chalybæus, HEINRICH MORITZ, a German philosophical writer, was born July 3, 1796, at Pfaffroda, in Saxony. He studied philosophy, theology, and philology at Leipzig, and was, in 1839, called as professor to Kiel, but was deposed on account of his anti-Danish sentiments. He died at Dresden, Sept. 22, 1862, leaving Historische Entwicklung der Speculativen Philosophie von Kant bis Hegel (Dresden, 1837, 5th ed. 1860; Engl. transl. Historical Development of Speculative Philosophy from Kant to Hegel, Andover, 1854);—System der Speculativen Ethik (Leipzig, 1850, 2 vols.);—Philosophie und Christenthum (Kiel, 1853);—Fundamentalphilosophie (ibid. 1861). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 219. (B. P.)

Chama, in the mythology of the Burmese, is one of the three classes into which they divide all living things. The Chama are divided into eleven grades, seven happy and four unhappy. In one of the seven happy grades man lives; in the remaining six, higher beings; the four unhappy are the grades of fallen spirits, who dwell in the dark abysses of the earth.

Chamber, in architectural usage, is a room or apartment, distinguished from the hall, chapel, etc. The great chamber usually adjoined, or was contiguous to, the hall, and answered to the modern drawing-room, or with-drawing-room. The camera of an abbot or prior means his suite of lodgings in the establishment. The guest-chamber was usually over the buttery and pantry, at the lower end of the hall, in a mediæval house, and in monasteries near the entrance. In some instances there was a separate hall called the Guesten-hall, as at Worcester.

Chamberlain, in a monastery, was overseer of the dormitory, and purchased clothes, bed furniture, and other necessities. He received all considerable sums of money or other dues. He acted as treasurer, having the charge of nearly every considerable payment. At Durham his exchequer was near the abbey gates, under which was the tailors' shop for making linsey-woolsey shirts and tunics for the monks and novices, and whole and half socks of white woollen cloth. At Abington his chamber was in the dormitory. He provided copes, albs, cowls, coverlets, hoods, shoes and boots, towels, combs, knives, beds, straw palliases, stools, bed-perches, hot water, tools for the tailors and cordwainers, five lights burning in the dormitory from twilight to dawn, and baths three times a year. At Canterbury he provided mats, blankets, razors, all the monks' clothing, horseshoes for the farriers, and glass for the dormitory. The old clothing was distributed by him to the poor. Under him were the laundry folk, peltmen, or skin dressers, tailors, shoemakers, etc. In a cathedral he was often called the provost, and, like the massarius in Italy, chamrier of Lyons, Strasburg, and Saragossa, was the receiver of rents and paymaster of the stipends and money for pittances, and general accountant of income and keeper of the common chest. He was annually elected, and took precedence of canons while in office. At St. Paul's he found the necessities for divine service and posted the summonses of prebendaries to chapter on their stalls, and at York acted as punctuator of the absences of the vicars. In the latter instance he might be a vicar.

Chamberlain, Charles, a Congregational minister, was born at Holliston, Mass., Oct. 4, 1813. For a time he was a student in Leicester Academy. In 1836 he graduated from Brown University, and in 1839 from Union Theological Seminary, having spent one year at the Andover Seminary. Meanwhile, in 1837 and 1838, he was tutor in Brown University. Two years he served as a home missionary in Ohio and Indiana. He was ordained pastor in Berkley, Mass., July 8, 1842, and was dismissed in 1844. The three years following he was acting pastor in Freetown; in 1847 and 1848, in Newmarket, N. H.; from 1848 to 1850, in Mendham, Mass. From July, 1851, to December, 1853, he was pastor in Auburn. In June, 1854, was installed in Ashford, Conn.; from April, 1858, to March, 1867, was pastor in Eastford, Conn. Then he served as acting pastor as follows: at Oxford, from 1867 to 1869; Reading, from 1869 to 1871; Burlington, from 1871 to 1873; East Granby, from 1874 to 1881. His death occurred in East Granby, March 30, 1881. He published The Layman's Assistant and Home Monitor. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 24.

Chamberlain, Chester, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Thetford, Vt., Jan. 19, 1807. He removed in his youth to Watervliet, N. Y., where he experienced religion; and, in 1834, united with the Troy Conference, wherein he labored with fidelity and success twenty-two years. In 1866 he became supernumerary, in which relation, and that of a superannuate, he continued to the close of his life, July 30, 1875. Mr. Chamberlain was a man of devout and genial spirit, of harmonious and uniform Christian character. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 82.

Chamberlain, Hiram, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Monkton, Vt., April 2, 1797. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1822; studied theology at Princeton Seminary for one year, and subsequently at Andover Theological Seminary, where he graduated in 1825. He was ordained evangelist by the Presbytery of N. Y., Oct. 16, the same year; became a home missionary in St. Louis, Mo. (1825–1826); served as stated supply at Darden (1827), at Boonville (1828–1833), at Franklin and Fayette (1833–1835); and was pastor of the 2d Church of St. Charles (1837–1844). He was editor of the Herald of Religious Liberty, St. Louis, for about two years. He became stated supply of Somerville and Bethany, Tenn. (1846–1850); and thereafter at Brownsville, Texas, where he died, Nov. 1, 1866. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 44; Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 63.

Chamberlain, Jason, a Congregational minister, teacher, and lawyer, was born at Holliston, Mass., Feb. 9, 1783. His early education was thorough, and he graduated with the highest honors at Brown University in 1804. He first preached at Thomaston, Me., was ordained at Guilford, Vt., in 1808; and was dismissed from that church in 1811, to become professor of Latin and Greek in the University of Vermont. In 1814 he went West, and was one of the founders of Jackson, Mo. Retiring from the ministry, he went into the practice of law, and in 1820 was drowned while going the circuit of the courts in Arkansas. Mr. Chamberlain's publications were a Sermon at the funeral of Gen. Henry Knox, 1807; and an Inaugural Oration at Burlington, Vt., in 1811.

Chamberlain, Joseph H., a Baptist minister, was born at Thetford, Vt., Feb. 25, 1800. Early in his life the family moved from Vermont to Western New York, and there, in a log school-house, while attending a revival meeting, he became a Christian when he was seventeen years of age. He went, in 1825, to the Hamilton Institute, now Madison University, to prepare for the ministry. He was ordained in 1828, and settled in South Berlin, N. Y. His pastorate there covered the period of twenty-seven years, and his residence in the vicinity continued fifty-two years. For brief periods he lived in other places. He was, for a year and a half, agent of the Education Society at Hamilton. When not acting as a pastor, he performed a large amount of evangelistic labor in Norwich, Oxford, Greene, Coventry, the Hudson valley, and other places. He possessed more than ordinary gifts as a preacher. It is said of him that his eccentricities of speech and manner were marked, but it is thought that they added to rather than impaired his power. "When the heavenly gale blew upon him," as he often said, he loved to preach, and at such times his audiences heard him with delight. He was able to stir both the fountain of laughter and the fountain of tears. It is believed that during his long and laborious ministry he baptized more than one thousand persons on a personal profession of their faith in Christ. He died at Holmesville, N. Y., March 24, 1880. See New York Examiner, April 8, 1880. (J. C. S.)

Chamberlain, Josiah F., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born Sept. 6, 1786. He was converted in 1800; began preaching in 1811; and subsequently became a member of the Vermont Conference, wherein he labored faithfully till his death, March 26, 1864. Mr. Chamberlain was exemplary and eminently successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 110.

Chamberlain, Levi, a lay missionary, was born at Dover, Vt., and for many years devoted himself successfully to business in Boston. He finally determined to relinquish secular life and devote himself to the work of aiding in the spread of the Gospel among the heathen, and for that purpose went to the Sandwich Islands and was appointed secular superintendent of the missions there. "His various toils were incessant and most important, as he had judgment, caution, prudence, economy, and self-denial." After twenty years of service in the cause of his Master, he died at Honolulu, July 29, 1849. See Missionary Herald, Dec. 1849. (J. C. S.)

Chamberlain, Philip, a Baptist minister, was born at Hebron, Me., in 1796. His opportunities for obtaining an education were very limited, and at the age of thirty-five years he was a hard worker on a small farm in Maine. After this he was set apart to the work of the ministry, and for many years traversed what was then the wild region of Coos Co., N. H., and through his simplicity of character and earnestness of purpose accomplished much good. In later life he was settled in Bradford and other villages in New Hampshire, and in places in Vermont. He spent his last days in East Milford, N. H., where he died, Feb. 25, 1878. (J. C. S.)

Chamberlain, Pierce, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Newark, Del., June 11, 1790. He attended the Academy of Andover, and also at Newark Academy, and studied theology with private instructors. In 1822 he was licensed to preach by the New Castle Presbytery. He had much of the missionary spirit, and for a time labored in the almshouses and prisons of Philadelphia. After a few years he was ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of New Castle, and received a commission from the Board of Missions to labor within the bounds of the Presbytery of Erie. He first visited the shore of Lake Erie in 1826, and labored for some time in the vacant churches with much acceptance. In 1828 he was installed pastor of the Church of Springfield, in Erie Co. On account of ill-health this relation was dissolved the same year, and then, till 1836, he labored as a missionary throughout the bounds of the presbytery, preaching wherever he could collect a congregation. In 1836 he accepted calls from Waterford and Union; giving up the latter, he labored at Gravel Run. His health failing, he was released from the pastoral charge. He soon after left Erie Presbytery and returned to Newark. At the time of the division of the Church in 1838, Mr. Chamberlain identified himself with the New School. After his return to Newark he took charge of a female seminary, where he labored till his death, Aug. 23, 1850. See Hist. of the Presbytery of Erie.

Chamberlain, Remembrance, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Vermont. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1814, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1819, and was ordained a minister in the Presbyterian Church. He preached at Madison, Ga., in 1825; went in 1826 to Bethel and preached for two years; from 1828 to 1830 was stated supply at Decatur, from 1830 to 1833 at Forsyth, and for the next year at Jackson. He acted in the capacity of an agent for the Church thereafter until his death in 1855. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 22.

Chamberlain, Robert, an English Congregational minister, was born at Ravenstonedale, Westmoreland, Sept. 5, 1797. He was educated at a free grammar-school. After his conversion he commenced to study for the ministry, under Rev. M. McLean, of Kendal. In August, 1819, he was admitted to Hoxton Academy. He became pastor at South Shields in 1823, where he was ordained; at Petworth in 1828, and at Swanage in 1832. In 1852 he was at Falcon Cliff, Isle of Man. In December, 1855, he went to Oakham, and died there on the 30th of the same month. He was unaffected, upright, and conscientious in public as well as in private life. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1857, p. 170.

Chamberlain, Uriah Tracy, a Congregational minister, was born at Richmond, N. Y., March 3, 1809. His academic education was acquired in Rochester, N. Y. For a year he was a member of the Lane Theological Seminary, but graduated at Oberlin Seminary in 1838. Feb. 16 of the same year he was ordained pastor of the Church in Fitchville, O., where he served until April 1, 1840. The next year he was acting pastor in Fred-erictown. From 1841 to 1843 he preached in Lafayette and Seville. Feb. 15, 1844, he was installed pastor in Strongsville, but only remained until the following November. From 1847 to 1849 he was acting pastor in North Madison; from 1849 to 1853, in West Andover; from 1853 to 1856, in Conneaut, Penn.; from 1856 to 1859, in Cambridge; from 1861 to 1870, in Centreville and Riceville; from 1870 to 1872, in Churchville, N. Y., and also in Stockholm; from 1872 to 1875, without charge; from 1875 to 1878, was acting pastor in Hartford, O. Subsequently he resided, without charge, in Cambridge, Pa., where he died, Jan. 10, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 19.

Chamberlayne, ISRAEL, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Butternuts, Otsego Co., N. Y., Sept. 6, 1795. He joined the Church at the age of fifteen; received license to exhort in 1811, to preach in 1812, and in 1813 united with the Genesee Conference. From extreme nervous sensibility he was obliged to retire from the itinerancy in the meridian of life, and thereafter devoted himself to writing sermons, essays, reviews, and valuable volumes. His most important publications are, The Past and the Future:—Australian Captive:—Saving Faith. He died at Lyndonville, Orleans Co., N. Y., March 20, 1875. Dr. Chamberlayne was a master in logic, an original explorer in metaphysics and theology; intensely exact as a linguist; keenly sharp as a controversialist, and poetically critical as a rhetorician. As a preacher, he was interesting, instructive, and powerfully eloquent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 136; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, a. v.

Chamberlin, Nelson P., a Presbyterian minister, was born in New York. He graduated at Oberlin College in 1842, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1845; and was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, April 17, 1845. He was stated supply at the First Church, Madison Parish, La., from 1847 to 1850; missionary and stated supply at Thibodeaux, in 1858, and pastor from 1859 to 1863. He was infirm at Houma in 1867 and 1868; and resided thereafter at Wheeling, W. Va. He died in 1869. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 135.

Chamberlin, Parmele, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Dalton, Mass., Aug. 11, 1801. He was converted at the age of sixteen, began preaching two years later, and in 1823 entered the New York Conference, wherein he labored as health permitted to the close of his life, in March, 1856. Mr. Chamberlin was an instructive and useful preacher, a faithful pastor, and an exemplary Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1856, p. 58.

Chamberlin, William, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Newbury, Orange Co., Vt., Feb. 29, 1791. He attended the academy at Wilkesbarre, was licensed in 1817, and was very soon commissioned by the American Board as missionary to the Cherokees. In 1840 he entered the service of the Alton Presbytery. He was largely instrumental in forming many churches. His labors extended through all the counties bordering on the Mississippi, the Ohio, and the Wabash. He died March 14, 1849. See Norton, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Illinois.

Chamberlin, William Rogers, a Universalist minister, was born in Brookfield, Carroll Co., N. H., Nov. 2, 1816. He taught school in his young manhood; was licensed to preach in 1844, and ordained at Dighton, Mass., in 1847, where he spent some time preaching, and then engaged as missionary in Virginia. In 1849 he went to Cincinnati, O., where for twelve years he was employed as a book-keeper, acting in the meantime as Sunday-school superintendent of the Universalist churches in the city. In 1867 he again entered the ministry, and labored successively at Mendota, Ill.; Vinton, Council Bluffs, and Dubuque, Ia.; and finally at Clinton, N. Y., where he continued to the close of his life, April 28, 1876. Mr. Chamberlin was a man of marked ability, especially as an extemporaneous speaker, and possessed great geniality. See Universalist Register, 1877, p. 113.

Chambers, E. C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1813. He was for several years a local preacher, and in 1853 was ordained local deacon. In 1854 he entered the Michigan Conference, and was ordained elder in 1858. He labored consecutively at Addison, Reading, California, Osseo, Burr Oak, Union City, Bedford, Richfield, Oshtemo, North Adams, Whitehall, and Pentwater, and died at Victor, Mason Co., Mich., March 11, 1881. For seven years previous he had held a superannuated relation. He was a sweet-spirited Christian man, and his zealous labors were abundantly successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 311.

Chambers, John, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Stewartstown, Ireland, Dec. 19, 1797, and brought to America while an infant. At the age of sixteen the son went to Baltimore and took a situation as clerk in a hardware store. On becoming a Christian, he began his theological studies under Rev. James Gray. He was ordained at New Haven in 1825, and called to the charge of a Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, which subsequently bore his name, and in which he ministered upwards of fifty years. He early rose to eminence as a preacher. His natural endowments were remarkable. To a fine physique, showing great muscular and nervous force, he had a voice which rang out like a bugle's blast, and it never gave an uncertain sound in the cause of truth and righteousness. He was abundant in labors, seeming never to need rest, preaching almost incessantly. During a stay of nine days in Baltimore, he preached seven times and delivered nineteen addresses. He died Sept. 22, 1875. See Presbyterian, Oct. 23, 1875. (W. P. S.)

Chambers, John R., an English Wesleyan minister, was born in London, June 24, 1812. When six years of age his parents removed to South Wales, where he was converted. He was called to the ministry in 1838, and died at Llandysil, June 10, 1864. He was a plain, practical preacher. See Minutes of the British Conferences, 1864, p. 23.

Chambers, John W., a Baptist minister, was born in Wayne Co., Miss., Sept. 21, 1818. He united with the Church in 1836, and was ordained Feb. 3, 1843. His first pastorate was with the Antioch Church, Tenn., and he afterwards ministered to several churches in Scott and Newton counties, Miss., until 1855, when he moved to Marshall County, but soon after returned to Tennessee, and took up his residence in Saulsbury, preaching to the Rocky Spring and other churches. In 1871 he was appointed agent for home missions, and in 1872 agent of the Foreign Mission Board for West Tennessee. He died at Milan, Feb. 23, 1873. See Borum, Sketches of Tennessee Ministers, p. 120-122. (J. C. S.)

Chambers, Robert Daniel, A.M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Martinsburg, Berkeley Co., Va., Jan. 4, 1823. He received a private preparation for college, but his father's resources being too limited to assist him further, he was apprenticed to a printer in his native town, and while thus employed, improved every available opportunity for extending his knowledge. He was soon after converted, and in 1845 entered the East Baltimore Conference; in 1859, became professor in Irving Female College; in 1864, president of Emory Female College, of which he was the founder, and died in Carlisle, Pa., Sept. 8, 1864. Mr. Chambers was conscientious, intensely patriotic, a bold, fierce denouncer of evil; possessed an iron will and deep piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 254.

Chambers, Thomas, an English engraver, was born in London about 1724. The following are his principal plates: The Holy Family; St. Martin Dividing his Cloak; St. Peter and St. John Healing the Sick; The Good Man at the Hour of Death. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Chambers, William, an English Wesleyan minister, became a local preacher in 1830, and studied theology for a time at Edinburgh. He entered the ministry in 1832, and labored faithfully for a long period. He became a supernumerary in 1872, and died at Clapham, Jan. 14, 1882, aged seventy-five years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1882, p. 20.

Chambray, Robert de, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Évreux, of the Norman family Ferté-Fremel. He was elected abbé of Saint-Étienne at Caen, and pope Clement VI gave him the right of carrying the pontifical ornaments even in the presence of the bishop of the diocese. He died in 1393. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chamfer (or Champfer), an arris or angle which is slightly pared off is said to be chamfered: a chamfer resembles a splay, but is much smaller, and is usually taken off equally on the two sides; it applies to wood-work as well as stone. In the Early English and Decorated styles, more especially in the former, chamfers frequently have ornamental terminations of several kinds, some of which are sufficiently marked to be characteristic of the date of the architecture, and they are more varied, and produce a stronger effect, than might be expected in such minute features. The angles of Early English buttresses are very commonly chamfered.

Chamilard (or Chamillart), GASTON, a French theologian, and doctor at the Sorbonne, died about 1690, leaving De Corona, Tonsura et Habitu Clericorum (Paris, 1659, 8vo):—Déclaration de la Conduite de M. l'Archevêque de Paris Contre le Monastère de Port-Royal (ibid. 1667). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chammak is a name frequently found in the designation of churches in the west of Scotland, indicating the existence of a local saint of that name, or more probably Coman (Orig. Par. Scot. ii, 29 sq.; Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, p. 299).

Chammanim. See IDOL (14).

Chamnee, MAURICE, a Roman Catholic writer, probably born in London, was bred a friar at the Charter House. He was imprisoned in the reign of Henry VIII for refusing the oath of supremacy with eighteen others of his order, all of whom lost their lives for fidelity to their conscience, Chamnee alone escaping to write a history of their execution. His convent was also destroyed. Fearing persecution, he fled beyond the seas, and passed the rest of his life on the Continent, dying in 1581. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), ii, 382.

Chamorro, JUAN, a Spanish historical painter, studied under Herrera the elder. From 1669 to 1673 he was president of the Academy of Seville. His principal works were in the Convent of Mercy at Seville. They represent subjects from the life of the Virgin, and the Four Doctors of the Church. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chamousset, CLAUDE HUBERT, Piarron de, a French philanthropist, was born at Paris in 1717, of one of the most distinguished families. As soon as he became master of his fortune he changed his residence into a hospital, and hired a house at the gate of Sévres for a similar purpose. He was also appointed general intendant of the military hospitals. The "Petite Porte de Paris" was established after his plans, and to him we owe the first idea of fire insurance companies. Chamousset died April 27, 1773. He published among other works a large number of Mémoires on military hospitals, on abandoned children, on the extinction of mendicity, etc. His complete Works were published by Catton des Houssayes (Paris, 1788, 2 vols. 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champagne (or Champaigne), PHILIPPE DE, a Belgian painter, was born at Brussels, May 26, 1602. The greatest assistance he ever obtained was from Fouquières, who lent him some of his drawings. His works were distinguished for an admirable system of coloring, and he was a close imitator of nature. The best are in the ceiling in the king's apartment at Vincennes, on the subject of the peace of 1659; St. Philip in Meditation; and in the Carmelite Convent at Paris, The Nativity; The Adoration of the Magi; The Circumcision; The Assumption; The Raising of Lazarus; The Descent of the Holy Ghost. Champagne died in Paris, Aug. 12, 1674. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Champagny, FRANÇOIS, count de, a French writer, was born at Vienna, Sept. 10, 1804, and was the second son of the duke of Cadore, the minister of Napoleon I. He took an active part in the issue of the Ami de la Religion and the Correspondant, and was one of the founders of the Revue Contemporaine. In 1869 he was elected a member of the French Academy, and died May 4, 1882. His most important works are, L'Histoire des Césars (4 vols. 1841-43; 2d ed. 1853):—Les Antonins (3 vols. 1863; 2d ed. 1866):—and Les Césars du III^e Siècle (3 vols. 1870). (B. P.)

Champchevrieux, GUILLAUME DE, a French religious writer, was born at Orleans in 1558. He was made doctor of theology, and taught in the Convent of La Place Maubert at Paris; but during the political troubles of the time he remained faithful to the king. He became provincial of his order, and labored for its reformation and the extension of its privileges. He died in 1631, leaving De Antiquitate et Privilegiis Ordinis Carmelitani (Paris, 1627), and several other treatises in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champeil, PIERRE (or LÉONARD), a French theologian, was born at Treignac in 1590. He entered the Jesuit order at the age of nineteen, and taught theology and moral philosophy at Bordeaux, as a zealous sectary of Occam and the Nominalists. He died April 12, 1669, leaving Les Vérités Catholiques (Paris, 1664). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champfleur, FRANÇOIS DE, a French theologian who lived in the first part of the 17th century, was of the order of the Benedictines, and wrote Le Dilettable Parricide de Henry le Grand, translated from the Latin of Nicolas Bourbon, in verse (Paris, 1610, 8vo):—Funébres Cyprès sur la Mort de Henry IV, in verse (ibid. eod.):—La Grandeur sur le Sacre de Louis XIII (ibid. eod.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champion, ANTOINE DE, a Swiss prelate, was first senator and then president of the senate of Chambéry. On the death of his wife he embraced the ecclesiastical state, and was appointed bishop of Mondovì in 1485. Pope Innocent VIII nominated him bishop of Geneva in 1491, but the chapter there called as their bishop Charles du Seyssel, a divine of the order of Saint Anthony of Vienna. Champion transferred his official court to Annecy, but was finally induced to return to Geneva by a present of four hundred florins. He held a synod in 1498 for the reformation of his diocese, and died in 1495, leaving Constitutiones Synodales Episcopatus Genevensis (Geneva, 1493, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champion (DE NILON), CHARLES FRANÇOIS, a French theologian, was born at Rennes, Feb. 1, 1724. He entered the order of the Jesuits, Feb. 2, 1735, and taught theology at La Fleche. After the dissolution of his order he became priest of the Church of St. Vincent at Orleans; but having refused to take the oath to the constitution, he had to hide himself during the reign of terror, and died at his retreat, in 1794, leaving Critique Posthume d'un Ouvrage de Voltaire (London, 1772, 8vo):—Réflexions sur les Observations de Clément (Orleans and Paris, 1772, 2 vols. 12mo):—Morceaux Choisis des Prophètes (1777, 2 vols. 12mo):—Amusements Lyriques (Paris, 1778, 8vo):—Catéchisme Pratique (1783, 12mo):—Nouvelles Histoires et Paraboles (Paris, 1786, 12mo; Lyons, 1820, 12mo; and Paris, 1825, 18mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champion (née Palmer), ESTHER, a minister in the Society of Friends, was born about 1680. She was converted in youth, and in the course of her ministry, after having travelled many thousand miles in America, visited some parts of Great Britain, and was especially useful in London. She died Sept. 8, 1714. See Piety Promoted, ii, 94-98. (J. C. S.)

Champion, FRANÇOIS, a French theologian of the order of the Carmelites, who lived in the latter part of the 17th century, left a Latin poem called Stagnum (Paris, 1686; in the Pœmata Didascalica, Paris, 1749, 3 vols. 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champion (DE PONTALIER), FRANÇOIS, a French theologian, was born at Rennes, Oct. 21, 1731. He became a Jesuit, Sept. 19, 1752, and went to Paris. On the abolition of his order in France he retired first to Orleans, near his brother, and then to Rennes, where he pursued theological studies, and died Sept. 10, 1812. The following are the titles of his principal works: Variétés d'un Philosophe Provincial (Paris, 1767, 12mo):—Le Trésor du Chrétien (ibid. 1778, 2 vols. 12mo, etc.):—Le Théologien Philosophe (ibid. 1786, 2 vols. 8vo):—Nouvelles Lectures de Piété (Rennes, 1804, 4 vols. 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champion, George, a Congregational minister, was born in Connecticut in 1809. He graduated from Yale College in 1831, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1834; was ordained and became a missionary to South Africa the same year, and died at Santa Cruz, W. I., Dec. 17, 1841. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 107.

Champion (DE CÎCÉ), Jérôme Marie, a French prelate and statesman, was born at Rennes in 1735. In 1765 he was appointed general agent of the clergy of France; five years afterwards he was made bishop of Rhodes. In 1781 he was elevated to the archbishopric of Bordeaux, and in 1787 to the assembly of the notables. As a member of the constitutional committee, he made, in 1789, the report on the rights of man, which his brother, the bishop of Auxerre, also a member of the national assembly, opposed as useless. Louis XVI selected Champion de Cîcé, in place of Barantin, as keeper of the seals; an office which, since the times of cardinal de Biragné, who had done so much harm to France (1570-78), no minister had ever held. This nomination displeased many of the extreme parties; but Champion maintained his position from 1789 till November, 1790, when he resigned it, having, meanwhile, addressed to the national assembly several memoirs on the royal prerogatives. Afterwards the archbishop of Bordeaux was obliged to go into foreign countries (being in danger of persecution), where he lived ten years; but this exile ended by his submission to pope Pius VII, after which he was appointed archbishop of Aix, by the first consul, and directed all his attention to the erection of charitable establishments and schools. He died at Aix, Aug. 22, 1810. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champion, Judah, a Congregational minister, graduated from Yale College in 1751; was ordained pastor of the Church in Litchfield, Conn., July 4, 1753, and died in 1810. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 512.

Champion, Pierre, a French Jesuit and biographer, was born at Avranches, Normandy, Oct. 19, 1631. He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1651, and taught rhetoric ten years. Afterwards he went with a French fleet to Cayenne as chancellor, and on his return settled at Nantes, where he died, June 28, 1701. He wrote, La Vie du Père Rigoureux (Paris, 1666, 1694, 12mo; Lyons, 1735, 1789, 12mo); — La Vie du Père Sallémand (Paris, 1694, 12mo; Lyons, 1735, 12mo; Avignon, 1826, 12mo); — La Vie des Fondateurs des Maisons de Retraite (Nantes, 1698, 8vo), under the anagram Phonamic. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champion, William, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in St. Just, near Penzance, England, May 23, 1817. He united with the Church in 1840; began preaching in 1843; emigrated to America in 1848, and in 1850 was admitted to the Baltimore Conference. Between 1861 and 1867 he held a superannuated relation, and from that time was a supernumerary to the close of his life, Jan. 20, 1873. Mr. Champion was characterized by meekness, fidelity, zeal, and success. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 31.

Champlin, Albert, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in East Middlebury, Vt., Dec. 3, 1809. He was converted among the Congregationalists in 1825; joined the Methodists in 1827; soon after was licensed to exhort, and in 1834 entered the Troy Conference. He became superannuated in 1868, and died in Charlotte, Vt., June 18, 1872. Mr. Champlin labored on twenty-one different charges, was in thorough sympathy with all the interests of the Church, and devoted to God. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 67.

Champlin, James Tift, D.D., an eminent Baptist minister and educator, was born at Colchester, Conn., June 9, 1811. He graduated from Brown University with the highest honors in 1834; was tutor there from the fall of 1835 to March, 1838; and then became pastor of the First Baptist Church in Portland, Me. In 1841 he was made professor of ancient languages in Waterville College, now Colby University, and was president of the college from 1847 to 1872, greatly promoting the prosperity of the institution. He had the gift of awakening the sympathies and calling forth the aid of men of wealth. Soon after he resigned his office as resident he returned to Portland, where he died, March 15, 1882. Dr. Champlin was the author of several classical textbooks. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 199. (J. C. S.)

Champness, William Weldon, a deacon in the Church of England, was born in 1808. At St. Ebbe's, Oxford, he exhibited wonderful talent for teaching children by catechization; was some time curate in that place, and subsequently preached in Whitechapel, London. He died about 1875. See Christian Observer, March, 1875, p. 231.

Champney, Joseph, a Congregational minister, was born at Cambridge, Mass. He graduated from Harvard College in 1721; was ordained in Beverly, Mass., Dec. 10, 1729, and died Feb. 23, 1773, aged sixty-nine years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 25.

Champollion, Jean François, a famous French Egyptologist, was born Dec. 23, 1790, at Figeac. In 1816 he was appointed professor of history at the Academy of Grenoble, after having two years previously become known by his Égypte sous les Pharaons (Paris, 1814, 3 vols.). From 1828 to 1830 he travelled in Egypt, and after his return was called to the chair of Egyptology, which had been established for him in the Collège de la France. He died March 4, 1832, leaving, besides the above, De l'Écriture Hiéroglyphique des Anciens Égyptiens (Grenoble, 1821); — Précis du Système Hiéroglyphique des Anciens Égyptiens (Paris, 1824, 1828); — Panthéon Égyptien (ibid. 1823). After his death was published, Grammaire Égyptienne (ibid. 1836-41, 3 vols.); — Monuments de l'Égypte et de la Nubie, etc. (1835-45, 5 vols.); — Dictionnaire Égyptien en Écriture Hiéroglyphique (1842-44). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Champs, Étienne Agard de, a French Jesuit and theologian, was born at Bourges in 1613. He taught theology in the College of Rheims and at Paris, was three times provincial and deputy of his order to the papal court, and died at La Flèche, July 31, 1701, leaving Disputatio de Libero Arbitrio, etc. (Paris, 1642, 12mo; 1646); — Responsio ad Thériacum Vincentii Lenis (ibid. 1648; Cologne, 1650); — Le Secret du Jansénisme Découvert (1651); — De Haresi Janseniana (Paris, 1654, etc.); — Quæstio Facti (ibid. 1660); — Sanctus Augustinus Theologorum Aristoteles (published in the Selectæ Orationes Panegyricæ Societatis Jesu, Lyons, 1667); — Neuf Lettres sur la Grâce, Adressées au Prince de Conti et Suivies de Responses (Cologne, 1689, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Champs-Neufs, Pierre des, a French Jesuit of Nantes, who died May 20, 1675, in the seventy-third year of his age, is the author of Axiomata Evangelica ex Libris N. Testamenti: — Psalmi Davidici et Sacra Cantica in Breviario Romano Occurrentia cum Explanatione: — Suspiria Davidica: — Axiomata Evangelica Christi et Apostolorum Verbis Respondentia. Chananel Ben-Chushiel, a rabbi of Kairwan, in Africa, was born about 990, and died about 1050. He was one of the greatest teachers of his time, and is the author of a commentary on the Pentateuch and Ezekiel. He also wrote a commentary on the Talmudic treatise Makkoth. See Dr. Berliner's Migdal Chananel, sein Leben und Schriften, etc. (Leipsic, 1876); Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 163; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 75. (B. P.)

Chananja BEN-TERADION, a Jewish teacher of the 2d century, was one of the ten martyrs who died in the revolt of Bar-Cochba. He was found engaged in the perusal of a roll of the law. To the question how he had ventured to defy the imperial edict, he replied by appealing to the higher duty of unconditional obedience to the laws of his God. Chananja was sentenced to be wrapped in the roll which he had been studying, and thus to be bound to the stake. One of his daughters was the wife of the famous rabbi Meïr (q. v.). See Edersheim, History of the Jewish Nation, p. 239 sq.; Hamburger, Real-Encyclop. für Bibel u. Talmud, s. v. (B. P.).

Chananja, KOHEN, a Jewish writer, who was born Nov. 18, 1757, at Reggio, and died March 29, 1834, at Florence, is the author of זמירות ישראל, on ancient and modern Hebrew poetry (Leghorn, 1793):—מנחה לשון, Vocabulario Ebraico-Italiano et Ital.-Ebraico (Reggio, 1811-12, 2 vols.):—ורה חרשה Seu Nova Methodus Versificationis Hebr. (ibid. 1822):—שניר, לשון הקודש, a Hebrew grammar (Venice, 1808):—ששה אחי, on the Hebrew words in the Mishna which do not occur in the Bible at all, or do occur, but in a different sense (Reggio, 1822):—Ruggio di Eloquenza Ebreica (Florence, 1827). See Ghironi, Toldot, p. 104; Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Handbuch, p. 35; Fürst, Bibl. Jud., i, 181 sq. (s. v. Coëh). (B. P.)

Chancellor OF THE CHOIR is the dignitary in a cathedral next in rank to a precentor, and presides over the readers of the lessons in church, and the schools of the city and cathedral. The office was instituted in England in the 12th century, but in France apparently not until the 13th. The dignitary bore the name in foreign chapters of scholasticus scholarca cabiscol, that is, caput scholæ, head of the school, magistral and theological. Like the Greek chartophylax, he was the librarian and secretary of the chapter, and sealed the capitular correspondences. He also acted as the theological lecturer and reader in canon law. The chancellor's name is derived from that of the law officer who stood at the bar ad cancellos to receive the pleas of suitors, and was keeper of the court seal. The chancellor of a university has the sole executive authority within the precinct.

Chancellor, SAMUEL, an English Congregational minister, was born at Kensington, Jan 12, 1795. During the greater part of his life he labored at his trade of coach-building, but spent his leisure time in self-improvement and diligent study. He was first engaged as a Sunday-school teacher, then in itinerant labors in and around Kensington, twenty-six years, on the Sabbaths. For a short time he accepted a charge at Hayes, in Middlesex, and in 1847 at Epping, Essex. He died suddenly, Nov. 23, 1853. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1854, p. 221.

Chancels (cancelli) are screens, often of great beauty and richness, set round an altar, or the choir, or tombs of saints. The original chancels were those which divided the choir from the nave, forming a line of demarcation between the clergy and the laity. Leo III erected a chancel of pure silver, and Stephen IV placed another of the same material round an altar. The second council of Tours enjoined the people not to stand near the altar among the clerks at vigils or mass, because that part of the church which is divided off by chancels is restricted to the use of the singing clerks. Gregory of Tours mentions a chancel in the chord of the apse in San Pancrazio near Rome, and at Santa Sophia, Constantinople. The chancel fenced the entrance to the sanctuary.

The chancel-screens round the choir were called, in Spain, rejas, and elsewhere pectorals, being a wall breast-high at which the faithful communicated and received the palms and ashes when they were distributed. It was identical with the peribolos which was introduced when the hours were first sung in choir during the 4th century. The solid and taller screen does not date earlier than the 12th century. Sometimes the chancels had a balustrade and columns, called regulars, placed at intervals; on these curtains were suspended, so as to resemble the Greek iconostasis; Gregory of Tours notices that they were embroidered and painted with sacred images in France. At certain times in the service these veil-like draperies were drawn back and again closed, unlike the modern custom of leaving the whole vista of the interior and the altar in full view; this utter change from the more ancient idea of seclusion of the sacred mysteries emanated from the Jesuits, contemporaneously with the introduction of the ceremony of benediction, and has resulted in a wholesale destruction of the rood-screens. The latter, which are the true representatives of the primitive chancels, marked the separation between the clergy and laity, and also symbolized the entrance to the Church triumphant. For this reason they were painted, as at Hexham, with figures of saints, or with the sentences of the creed, or with the destruction of the dragon, or the Last Judgment. Two of these screens, of open-work, of the time of Wren, exist at St. Peter's, Cornhill, and All-Hallows the Great, Thames Street, London; while beautiful specimens of lateral choir-screens remain at Alby, at Paris, of the 14th century, at Chartres and Amiens, of the 15th century, and of the 13th century at Canterbury. The chancels mostly, however, have shrunk into the mere altar-rail round or in front of the altar, dividing, not as before, the nave from the choir, but the choir from the sanctuary.

Chanche, JOHN JOSEPH, a Roman Catholic bishop, was born in Baltimore, Md., of French refugees from St. Domingo, Oct. 4, 1795. He was ordained in 1819, became a member of the Society of St. Sulpice, acquired a high reputation as professor and president of St. Mary's College, Baltimore, was consecrated bishop of the newly erected diocese of Natchez, Miss., March 14, 1841, and after attending the Council of Baltimore in 1852, died suddenly at Frederick, Md., July 22 of the same year. Chanche, a man fitted to shine among the learned, gave his talents to an obscure and laborious field, zealously serving as a missionary priest, building up with no resources a new diocese. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the U. S. p. 150, 604-606.

Chanderma, in Hindû mythology, is one of the forms of the name of the moon-god. He is also the sovereign of the entire expanse of the air, in which he lives. He loved Tarci, the young and beautiful wife of Vyasha, and from this love the celebrated Buddha is said to have come. Vyasha adopted the latter as his son, and instructed him in all branches of science. See CHANDRA.

Chandler, Amariah, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Deerfield, Mass., Oct. 27, 1782. He graduated at the University of Vermont in 1807, and was ordained pastor of the Church in Waitsfield, Vt., in 1810; here he remained until 1830; preached two years at Hardwick, and was installed over the Church in Greenfield, Mass., in 1832, and died there in the pastoral office, Oct. 20, 1864. Dr. Chandler was a delegate to the Massachusetts Convention for the Revision of the State Constitution in 1853. He published several sermons and treatises, including A Review of Dr. Willard's Historical Discourse (1857). His mind was strong and independent; his manners were simple; he was much beloved for his kindness and sociability, and his sermons were solid and impressive. See Cong. Quarterly, 1865, p. 208, 421.

Chandler, Augustus, a Congregational minister, was born in North Woodstock, Conn., Dec. 1, 1830. He graduated from Williams College in 1855, and during the following year taught school in Westbrook. In 1859 he graduated from Andover Theological Seminary. Sept. 12, 1860, he was ordained at Saxton's River in Rockingham, Vt., and remained there one year as acting pastor. From 1861 to 1864 he ministered in Lempster, N. H., and on Dec. 28 of the latter year was installed pastor in Strafford, Vt. Having removed to Dummerston, he was made pastor of the church there, Dec. 18, 1867, and held that charge until Aug. 24, 1870. After this he resided in Brattleboro'. In 1875 he became editor and proprietor of the Record and Farmer. He died March 26, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 19.

Chandler, Charles N., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Maryland, was originally a member of the Baptist Church, but about the year 1866 he entered the Episcopal communion. He was appointed secretary of the Church Book Society, New York city, about this time, and in 1868 became secretary of the Society for the Increase of the Ministry, residing in Poughkeepsie, N. Y. This office he held until 1871, when he removed to Baltimore, Md., as the associate secretary and general agent of the Domestic Committee of Missions. He died in Baltimore, in February, 1878, at the age of sixty years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 168.

Chandler, George, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Middletown, Conn., Jan. 24, 1790. He graduated from Yale College in 1813, and was licensed by the Huntingdon Presbytery, and stationed in Newark, N. J. In 1814 he was called to the First Presbyterian Church of Kensington, Philadelphia, where he remained till his death, Feb. 15, 1860. He was greatly beloved by his people, and the Church prospered under his ministry. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1861, p. 157.

Chandler, George Clinton, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Chester, Vt., March 19, 1807. He graduated from Madison University in 1835, and from the Newton Theological Institution in 1838. After ordination at North Springfield, Vt., Sept. 5 of that year, he went to Indiana as home missionary there, and afterwards pastor at Indianapolis from 1839 to 1843. He was president of Franklin College, Ind., for the next seven years, and went as a missionary to Oregon in 1851. He had an attack of paralysis Nov. 22, 1874, and died at Forest Grove, Or., Jan. 19, 1881. See The Watchman, Feb. 24, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Chandler, Hubbard, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Wilton, Franklin Co., Me., Jan. 11, 1798. He was converted at twenty, and immediately began preaching. He was ordained in Phillips, June 27, 1822, and travelled extensively and successfully in Maine as an evangelist. As a speaker he was dramatic and powerful, but eccentric. During his last years he preached only occasionally. He died at West Poland, Me., Nov. 5, 1866. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1868, p. 88. (J. C. S.)

Chandler, J., an English Baptist minister, was pastor over the Church at Wedmore, Somerset, during his whole public career, commencing in 1814. He was the means of introducing the Gospel into several villages around, and for many years preached in one of them nearly every evening. He died Feb. 11, 1851.

Chandler, James, a Congregational minister, was born at Andover, Mass., in June, 1706. He graduated from Harvard College in 1728; was ordained minister of the second parish in Rowley, Mass., Oct. 18, 1732, and died April 16, 1789. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 454.

Chandler, John (1), an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Great Bardfield, Essex, April 10, 1787. He was a linen-draper by trade, and had but little scholastic education; but he applied himself diligently to study, familiarizing himself with Latin and several of the modern European languages, and general literature. In 1839 he went to the West Indies, under sanction of the Meeting for Sufferings, to relieve the miseries of the emancipated negroes. During his visit he explored many of the islands. In 1849 he made a second voyage to the West Indies in behalf of the Anti-Slavery Society. In 1850 he visited America. In 1852 he went to Portugal, to present to the queen of that country an address from the Society of Friends on slavery; and in the latter part of the same year he visited Brazil on a similar mission. In 1853 he was sent to America, to present to the governor of each state, and the president of the United States, a declaration from the Yearly Meeting of London on the unrighteousness of slavery. In 1862 he went to Norway as a missionary. He was one of the founders of the Auxiliary Bible Society, and was secretary of the same for fifty years. He died at Springfield, Chelmsford, July 4, 1869. See Annual Monitor, 1870, p. 39.

Chandler, John (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Enfield, Conn., Oct. 16, 1797. He was reared a Calvinist; experienced conversion at the age of twenty-four, and immediately joined the Methodists. He received license to preach in 1824, and in the same year united with the Pittsburgh Conference, in which he travelled large circuits for twelve years, and served as presiding elder eight years. In 1844 he entered the Rock River Conference, and labored faithfully until 1865, when he became superannuated, which relation he sustained to the close of his life, at his home in Peoria, Aug. 14, 1873. Mr. Chandler was deeply pious; powerful in prayer and preaching; a prudent, princely leader in Israel. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 147; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Chandler, Joshua, a Congregational minister, was born at Andover, Mass., May 17, 1787. He graduated at Harvard College in 1807; was ordained at Swansea, N. H., Jan. 20, 1819, and remained pastor there until Nov. 6, 1822. The day following he was installed in Orange, Mass., where he continued about five years. He became pastor in Bedford, Jan. 20, 1836, and finally in Pembroke, Feb. 9, 1842. He removed to Boston, and died there, May 31, 1854. See Necrology of Harvard College, p. 29. (J. C. S.)

Chandler, Leonard Niles, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Mississippi, July 9, 1841. He was converted in 1868, and in the same year was licensed to preach, and received into the Little Rock Conference, wherein he labored until his death, Oct. 11, 1871. Mr. Chandler exemplified Christianity by his true, devout life, earnest service, and great faith. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1871, p. 619.

Chandler, Richard, D.D., an English divine and antiquary, was born in 1738 at Elson, in Hampshire, and was educated at Winchester school and Queen's College, Oxford. His first work consisted of fragments from the minor Greek poets, with notes, in 1759; and in 1763 he published a fine edition of the Arundelian marbles, Marmora Ozoniensia, with a Latin translation. The same year Chandler, together with Revett, the architect, and Pars, the painter, was sent by the Dilettanti Society to explore the antiquities of Ionia and Greece. They returned to England in 1766, and, as a result of their joint investigations, they produced the two magnificent folios of Ionian antiquities, in 1769. Chandler also edited a valuable collection of inscriptions, entitled Inscriptiones Antiquae Pleraque Nondum Editae (Oxford, 1774). In 1775 he published his Travels in Asia Minor; in 1776, his Travels in Greece; and in 1800, his History of Ilium. After his return from Greece he obtained several Church preferments. He died in England in 1810. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.

Chandler, Samuel, a Congregational minister, was born at Andover, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1735; became pastor of the second parish of York, Me., Jan. 20, 1742; was dismissed in 1751; installed at Gloucester, Mass., Nov. 13, the same year; and died April 16, 1775, aged sixty-three years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 274.

Chandler, Theophilus Bradbury, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in East Woodstock, Conn., March 28, 1826. He experienced religion at the age of fourteen; graduated at Wesleyan University in 1850, and in the same year entered the New York East Conference. During the years of 1856-58 he was obliged to retire from regular work, but preached occasionally. In 1859 he resumed his place in the effective ranks, labored faithfully four years, when he was prostrated by hemorrhage of the lungs, and continued to decline in strength by repeated attacks until his death, June 20, 1866. Mr. Chandler possessed rare excellences, a quick mind, fine perceptions, poetic taste, retentive memory, genial temper, and an earnest, practical, sympathetic spirit. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 77; Alumni Record of Wesl. Univ. 1881, p. 103.

Chandler, Thomas W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born Dec. 30, 1799. He was converted in 1823, licensed to exhort in 1826, and in 1827 was licensed to preach, and admitted to the Kentucky Conference. In 1840 he was transferred to the Illinois Conference, in 1841, to the Missouri Conference, and in 1846, to the Ohio Conference. He located and returned to Illinois in 1850, and in the following year was readmitted to the Southern Illinois Conference, wherein he continued zealous and faithful until 1858 as an effective preacher, and from thence as a superannuate to the close of his life, Sept. 7, 1859. Mr. Chandler was an earnest student of theology, and a man of exemplary life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 362.

Chandra, in Hindû mythology, is one of the names for the moon or the genius inhabiting it. He married twenty-seven daughters of Daksha, but loved Rohini especially, and neglected the rest, for which their father cursed him, and he consequently died; but having repented of his error, he was again awakened. His children are called Children of the Moon, and form a separate family in the mythology of India. See SOMA.

Chandrayana (or Tsiandrayana), in Hindû mythology, is the moon-penance which the men, born again as Brahmins, practice as an atonement for sins committed in a lower grade of their existence. The body is scantily fed, only nuts of the woods being eaten.

Chanemundus. See ANEMONDUS.

Chaney, Bailey E., a Baptist minister, was born in South Carolina, and moved to Natchez about 1790. During the persecutions to which the Protestants in that part of Mississippi were subjected, Mr. Chaney managed to conceal himself. When the territory was brought under the government of the United States, "the people assembled in large numbers, a brush arbor was constructed, and he was sent for; and, while the flag of the United States floated over him, he preached the Gospel of Christ unawed by the minions of Rome." He visited, in 1798, an American settlement near Baton Rouge, La., and preached. He was arrested by the authorities and forced to leave the country. He went back to Mississippi, where he continued to labor until his death, which occurred about 1816. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 200. (J. C. S.)

Chaney, S. Freeman, a Free-will Baptist minister, son of Rev. John Chaney, was born in 1819. He was converted at fifteen, entered upon a course of study at Parsonsfield, Me., was ordained June 2, 1842, and became pastor of the Church in Buxton. At once there was a remarkable revival of religion, but he was attacked with bleeding at the lungs, retired from active service, and, in August, 1843, went to Plainfield, N. Y., where his father then resided. He continued to decline, until his death, Oct. 13, 1843. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1845, p. 74, 75. (J. C. S.)

Chanfaily L'ORPELIN, a French theologian, who lived in the former part of the 18th century, wrote L'Antiquaire de la Ville d'Alençon (1 vol. 16mo). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chang-ko is a Chinese goddess worshipped by bachelors, and held in great esteem by the learned men, as Minerva was by the Greeks and Romans.

Chanina BEN-DOSA, a Jewish teacher of the 1st century, was celebrated for his piety. It was said that a voice from heaven daily declared that the whole world was only preserved for the sake of Chanina. Among his recorded sayings are these: "The wisdom of a man will be abiding if his fear of sin is greater than his desire after wisdom only; but where search after wisdom takes precedence of the fear of sin, the former also will only prove a temporary possession;" also, "The man whose works exceed his wisdom really possesses firm and lasting wisdom; but he whose wisdom excels his works, will find that the former also will prove unstable" (Pirke Aboth, iii, a). Many anecdotes are related to show this rabbi's power over angels. See Hamburger, Real-Encyclop. für Bibel u. Talmud, ii, 120 sq.; Friedländer [M. H.], Geschichtsbilder aus der Zeit der Tanaiten und Amoräer (Brünn, 1879), p. 53 sq.; Ederheim, Hist. of the Jewish Nation, p. 141; Friedländer [M.], Ben Dosa und seine Zeit (Prague, 1872). (B.P.)

Chanler, ISAAC, an English Baptist minister, was born at Bristol in 1701. He came to Ashley River, near Charleston, S. C., about 1733, where he served as pastor fifteen years. He died Nov. 30, 1749, having published a treatise entitled The Doctrines of Glorious Grace Unfolded, Defended, and Practically Improved; also a treatise on Original Sin. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 47; Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. s. v.

Channing, HENRY, a Unitarian minister, was born at Newport, R. I., in 1760. He graduated at Harvard College in 1781, where also he was tutor from 1783 to 1786. He was ordained and installed over the Congregational Church in New London in 1787. A revival of religion commenced with his ministry, and continued two years. He was dismissed, at his own request, May 20, 1806. In January, 1808, he was called to the Congregational Church in Canandaigua, N. Y., and continued till May, 1811, when he resigned. His preaching during this period was never distinctively Unitarian, and, indeed, little was known of Unitarianism, at least in that part of the country. In 1817 he returned to New London, and in the two following years was a member of the Legislature of Connecticut. After this he went to New York city, where he died in 1840. He published two Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 361.

Chanorrier (or Chanorier), ANTOINE, de Miranges, a French Protestant minister and theologian, lived about 1550. He was sent by the Church of Geneva to the Church at Blois in 1558; the following year he was appointed pastor of Orleans. Chanorrier published La Légende des Prêtres et des Moines (Geneva, 1556, 16mo; Paris, 1560, 8vo). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chant, ECCLESIASTICAL. The following are additional particulars:

"Singing is mentioned in the apostolical times (Acts xvi. 25; 1 Cor. xiv. 26), just as our Lord and his disciples sang a 'hymn,' that is, certain psalms; but what the music was is unknown. The church song was probably founded on Greek music; and antiphonal singing, alluded to by Pliny, took its origin at Antioch, and was adopted by St. Basil at Neo-Cæsarea, in Egypt, Palestine, and Arabia. St. Ambrose introduced it into the West at Milan, employing the use of the East in psalms and hymns, which were responsively sung in the night hours during the Arian persecution by the empress Justina to relieve the weariness of watching. Previously, in many times and in many churches, single voices chanted while the congregation merely joined in at the end, and meditated in silence. The people now joined zealously in the chanting, until at length their extreme vociferation necessitated the institution of a distinct order of singers or choristers by the councils of Laodicea and Carthage, and at length, despite popular opposition, in the West, Milan became the school of music for western Europe, and the title of the old melody for the Te Deum, the Ambrosian Chant, preserves the name of its originator, although Gregory's name, as that of the later reformer, is now more commonly associated with it. In the East, Chrysostom, with melody and sweet harmony at night, the choral processions accompanied by tapers which were carried in cruciform stands, endeavored to outvie the attractive hymnody of the Ariana. Athanasius, at Alexandria, caused the reader to intone the Psalms with so slight an inflection of the voice that it was more like singing than reading, and Augustine contrasts it with the agreeable modulation used at Milan. Jerome complained of theatrical modulations in singing. Pope Gelasius, in 494, condemned the abuse, and in the 6th century Pope Gregory introduced the plain chant, a grave and natural tone which repressed the caprice of the singers, and reduced them to uniformity. In 708 Charlemagne enforced its observance throughout the Western Church. The Gregorian school at Rome was imitated by those of Lyons in France, and of Africa, mentioned by Gregory of Tours: St. Patrick in Ireland, Benedict and Theodore at Metz and Soissons, Augustine and Theodore at Canterbury, Precentor John of Rome at Wearmouth, James the Deacon at York, Eddi in Northumbria, c. 668, Puta at Rochester, and Mabran at Hexham, were the founders of the ecclesiastical chant in Great Britain. The councils of Cloveshoe and Trent, St. Bernard and John of Salisbury, in the reign of Henry, reprobated a florid style in church, for as early as the 11th century Thurstan of Caen, abbot of Glastonbury, endeavored to introduce a more pleasing melody than the Gregorian tones. Trumpets, cornets, pipes, and fiddles in 1512 are mentioned in English churches by Erasmus; virginals, viols, harps, lutes, daddles, recorders, flutes, drones, trumpets, whits, and shawms by Bale; bagpipes, lutes, harps, and fiddles by Whitgift. In 1635, lutes and harps were used at Hereford, and two sackbuts and two cornets at Canterbury; and at the Chapel Royal, Lincoln, Westminster, Durham, and Exeter orchestral music accompanied the chant after the Restoration. Country churches but recently lost such accessories. The early Anglican single chant was founded upon the plain chant, and the double chant occurs first in Dean Aldrich's MSS. Several of the Roman school rose to the pontificate, as Gregory II, Stephen III, and Paul I, on the Continent; and in England many of the precentors were raised to the episcopate or an abbacy, and were usually recommended for their office by their learning as well as for their musical skill, like Eadmer and John of Thanet at Canterbury, Simeon of Durham, Somerset of Malmesbury, and Walsingham of St. Albans. Monks in their monasteries followed the example of the clergy in their churches, and Lérins became the school of southern France. Some conventual rules, such as those of Hilarius, Macarius, and Serapion, allowed only the abbots to chant. Women joined in the chant, as appears from Gregory of Nazianzum, and Isidore of Damietta. The Capitulars permitted them to sing the rite antiphonally with men at funerals: and the Councils of Châlons and Aix-la-Chapelle, in the 19th century, desired nuns to sing the offices."

Chantal, JEANNE FRANÇOISE FRÉMYOT DE, a French abbess, was born at Dijon, Jan. 23, 1572. When twenty years of age she married Christophe de Bussy-Rabutin, baron of Chantal, by whom she had six children. After the assassination of her husband, in 1604, she placed herself under the spiritual guidance of Francis of Sales, and at his advice she founded, in 1610, the Order of Visitation at Annecy. When she died, Dec. 13, 1641, the order had already eighty-seven convents. Pope Benedict XIV beatified her in 1751, and Clement XIII canonized her in 1767. Her letters were published by Edouard de Barthélemy (Paris, 1860). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Chantelou (Lat. Cantalopus), CLAUDE, a French Benedictine, was born at Vion, in Anjou, in 1617. He entered as a novice at Fontevault, but in 1640 took the vows at St. Louis of Toulouse, a monastery of the congregation of St. Maur. He went later to St. Germain-des-Prés, and was commissioned with revising some editions of the fathers. He died at Paris, Nov. 28, 1664, leaving, Règle de Saint-Basile (1660, 8vo) :— Sermons de Saint-Bernard (1662, 4to). Claude Chantelou is believed to have been author of La Carte Benedictine, published in 1726, under the name of Frédéric le Chevalier, and of the collection entitled Bibliotheca Patrum Ascetica (1661-64, 5 vols. 4to). He was also one of the collaborators of Luc d'Achéry for the Spicilegium, and of Mabillon for the Acta. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chantrey, Sir FRANCIS, an eminent English sculptor, was born in 1782, at Norton, in Derbyshire. He received some instruction from John Raphael Smith, and in 1802 he advertised in the Sheffield papers to take crayon portraits. Shortly afterwards he visited Edinburgh and Dublin, and then London. In 1817 he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy. He was employed upon several statues for St. Paul's, besides designs for church sepulchres. He died in 1841. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chanukah was a Jewish festival of dedication or purification, which lasted eight days, during which everybody burned lights, each day one more than the preceding, and said prayers, but did no work as long as these lights burned. It was believed to have been instituted by Judas Maccabæus in memory of the repossession of the Temple, after its profanation by strange gods. Many fables of brutal ceremonies were said (by enemies) to have been practiced, which called forth the most cruel persecutions of the Jews on the part of their foreign masters. See DEDICATION.

Chanut, PIERRE-MARTIAL, a French theologian and translator, was abbe of Isoire, chancellor of queen Anne of Austria, and visitor-general of the Carmelites. He died Nov. 13, 1695, leaving Seconde Apologie de Justin pour les Chrétiens (from the Greek, Paris, 1670, 12mo), under the assumed name of Pierre Tondet, and in 1686, under the true name of the author:— Catholicisme du Concile de Trente (ibid. 1693, 12mo) :— Vie et Œuvres de Sainte Thérèse (written by herself, and translated from the Spanish, ibid. 1691, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chaos, in Greek mythology, was the primitive element, the formless, out of which everything arose—the deities, as well as heaven, air, earth, and sea, and all their inhabitants. Chaos united with Darkness (Cáligo) and produced Æther, Day, Erebus, and Night. The pairs again united, and thus Æther and Day produced Heaven, the Earth, and the Sea. Erebus and Night had as their children, Fate, Age, Death, Sleep, Dreams (Phantasus, Morpheus, Momus), the Parcæ, Discord, Misery, Revenge, Sympathy, and finally the Hesperidæ (Ægle, Hesperia, Arethusa). From the Earth and the Sea there descended a no less numerous offspring, Pain, Crime, Fear, Falsehood, Perjury, Intemperance, the Furies, Pride; also the Ocean, Pontus, Tartarus, Themis, and the Titans. It is plain that here are only personified powers or attributes of nature, and that these in the course of production were gradually separated more and more, until the Titans and the deities quarrelled about the land, which finally was peopled with human beings by Prometheus when he secured the fire from Olympus. See COSMOGONY.

Chapeauville (or Chapeaville), JEAN, a Belgian theologian and historian, was born at Liege, Jan. 5, 1551. He studied first at Liege and at Cologne, and then at the University of Louvain, where he received the title of doctor of theology. On his return to his native place (1578) he was appointed examiner of the synod, and the following year pastor of St. Michel, and canon of the Church of St. Pierre. He next taught theology in several seminaries, and showed the greatest devotion during the plague which desolated Liege and its neighborhood in 1581. He was successively inquisitor of the faith, canon of the cathedral, grand penitentiary, grand vicar of the prince-bishop, Ernest of Bavaria, archdeacon and provost of the chapter of St. Pierre. Chapeauville was honest, grave, and laborious, but he condemned Jean Delvaux, subprior of the Abbey of Stavelot, as guilty of magic, and delivered that unfortunate monk to the secular arm. Chapeauville died at Liege, May 11, 1617, leaving several works, of which the principal are, De Casibus Reservatis (Liege, 1596, 8vo; Louvain, 1637, 12mo):—Vita et Miracula Sancti Perpetui, Episcopi Trajectensis (Liege, 1600, 8vo):—De Necessitate et Modo Ministrandi Sacramenta Tempore Pestis (Mayence, 1612, 8vo):—Qui Gesta Pontificum Tungrensium, Trajectensium, et Leodiensium Scripserunt (Liege, 1612-16, 3 vols. 4to), esteemed as a collection of histories originating from Liege, with critical notes. After the death of the author, an abridgment of his life was put at the head of the first volume (May 11, 1617), and the work, with the date of 1618, received the following title: Historia Sacra, Profana, nec non Politica, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.

Chapel. Chapels may be divided into several classes: (1) as regards their relation to other churches; being (a) dependent on the church of the parish, or (b) independent, in some cases even exempt from episcopal visitation. (2) As regards their material structure; being (a) apartments in palaces or other dwellings; (b) buildings forming part of or attached to convents, hermitages, or the like; (c) buildings forming appendages to larger churches; (d) sepulchral or other wholly detached buildings.

The following classification has sometimes been made:

(1) Isolated or detached buildings for religious worship annexed or affiliated to mother churches, without the right of having a font or cemetery; called in the statutes of Canute, "a field church," and in modern times chapels of ease. (2) Those attached to a palace, castle, mansion, or college, less generally known as oratories; the earliest recorded in a college or university is at Paris in 1254. (3) Chuntries, or internal buildings within a church. (4) An aisle furnished with its own altar, chalice, paten, cruets, basin, pyx, and sacring-bell. (5) A set of vessels and vestments used in the service of the church, as when we read that a bishop bequeathed his chapel to a cathedral. (6) A well chapel, like that of the Perpendicular period, at Hempstead, Gloucestershire, or the still more famous St. Winifred's at Holywell, where the bath, which was a place of great resort, is star-shaped, and was formerly enclosed with stone screens; round it is a vaulted ambulatory, and in front there is an entrance porch; in the upper story there is a chapel. The chapels of the first class are not permitted to contain a font, and usually have no cemetery. The Saintes Chapelles of Paris, Vincennes, Dijon, Riom, Champigny, and Bourbon, so called as containing presumed relics of the Cross, were peculiar to France. That of Dijon is called the Palatine, from the palace of the dukes of Burgundy, in which it stood.

A strictly accurate division is, however, impossible, as some cases may be placed in either class. It is also impossible to draw a clear line between churches and chapels with regard to their material aspect, some of the latter being too important in a historical point of view, or too extensive and magnificent, to be omitted from any attempt to trace the progress of church building.

"In the 11th century, when the practice of building crypts or subterranean churches fell into desuetude, the chapel became an integral portion of the upper structure; usually there were three at the east end, one in the centre dedicated to St. Mary, set between two adjuncts. In the 12th century chapels were multiplied round the sanctuary; throughout the Norman style they were apsidal, but gradually became polygonal. In the 13th century, the Eastern chapels were added in still greater numbers round the choir; at Tours there were as many as fifteen. In this and the succeeding century chapels were erected between the buttresses of the nave-aisles. These are common abroad; and occur at King's College (Cambridge), and at Windsor, at Lincoln, in the presbytery, and formerly there was one in the nave at Canterbury.

"In England there are a group of chapels round the presbytery at Westminster, Tewkesbury, Pershore, radiating from the main building, but it was an uncommon arrangement, like the external range of chapels in the naves of Chichester and Manchester; and the lateral or transverse line (as at Gork) of those at Fountains, Peterborough, the Nine Altars of Durham, formerly at Bridlington, and that recently destroyed at Hexham, and the second or choir transept, as at Salisbury, Lincoln, and Canterbury. Chapels were usually founded as sepulchral chantries and maintained by families of distinction, by the bequests of ecclesiastics, and very frequently by confraternities and guilds. They resemble in many particulars the cubicles or side rooms of churches, which Paulinus of Nola says were allotted for prayer, devout reading, and commemoration of the departed; but they were no doubt rendered indispensable by the multiplication of altars which blocked up the nave and aisles, and by the enclosure of the choir with screens; and in foreign churches to strengthen the enormous stride of the buttresses, which was necessary to support the vast height of the walls, weakened by being pierced with a large clerestory. In order to provide still more room, aisles were added on either side of the transept, and in some cases there were both upper and lower chapels, as at Christchurch (Hants), and St. John's (Chester), like that built over the Cingiac ante-churches.

"In conventual establishments there was a chapel of the infirmary and a chapel of the guest-house. Occasionally we find chapels in towers, as at Canterbury and Dronheim; in western towers the dedication was usually to St. Michael, as the conductor of souls to Paradise. In Christchurch (Hants) and at Bury St. Edmund's and Abingdon there were several chapels built in the cemetery and close, and this may have been a not uncommon arrangement, until such parasitical buildings were absorbed into the central minister after its reconstruction with larger dimensions on a grander scale. In the Eastern Church at Moscow, Blanskenoi, on Mount Athos, and in several parts of Ireland, there were similar groups, usually seven in number, probably to preserve the principle of having only one altar in a church."

I. Domestic Chapels.—The earliest existing example of this class is probably the small chapel now known as the Sancta Sanctorum (originally St. Lawrence) in the fragment of the ancient palace of the Lateran which still remains. It was the private chapel of the popes, and appears to have existed as early as A.D. 383; for pope Damasus then placed there certain relics (MSS. Bibl. Vat. ap. Baronius). It is a small oblong apartment on an upper floor. The example next in date has, fortunately, been singularly well preserved. It is the domestic chapel in the archbishop's palace in Ravenna, constructed or decorated by archbishop Peter Chrysologus (elected A.D. 429). Of the same character is the chapel at Cividade, in Friuli, which, although forming part of a Benedictine convent, as it measures only thirty feet by eighteen feet, can hardly have been other than a private chapel, probably of the abbot. It is attributed on historical evidence to the 8th century. It is a parallelogram without an apse, about two fifths being parted off by a low wall, to serve as a choir.

II. Conventual Chapels were intended for the private and daily use of the community. In some instances even more than two chapels existed in a monastery: for Adamnan (De Situ Terrae Sancte, ii, 24) says that at Mount Tabor, within the wall of enclosure of the monastery, were three churches, "non parvi ædificii." In the tower or keep of the convent of St. Macarius in the Nitrian valley are three chapels, one over the other (Sir Gardner Wilkinson, Handbook of Egypt); but it does not appear what their date is.

In Ireland there still exist some small chapels which may be assigned with probability to very early dates. Mr. Petrie (Ecclesiastical Architecture of Ireland, p. 133) thinks that such structures as the oratory at Gallarus, in Kerry (shown on p. 893), may be considered to be the first erected for Christian uses, and at least as ancient as the conversion of the Irish by St. Patrick. This example measures externally twenty-three feet by ten, and is sixteen feet high, the walls being four feet thick. It has a single window in its east end. As early as the 5th or 6th centuries are such buildings as Tempull Ceannanach, island of Arran, bay of Galway; Church of St. MacDara, island of Cruach Mhic Dara, which are simple quadrangular buildings, without distinction between nave and chancel. Others, apparently of equal antiquity, have a small chancel attached to the nave, and entered by an archway. In no case is an apse found in Ireland.

Many of these small chapels were built of wood, and were known as "Duirtheachs," or "Derttheachs," (i. e. house of oak). Buildings of very similar character exist in Cornwall, and their foundation is attributed to missionaries from Ireland: such was the chapel of P'erra-zabuloe, or, St. Piran in the Sand, said to have been founded by St. Piran (or, as he is called in Ireland, St. Kieran) in the 5th century. It had been completely buried in the shifting sand of the coast, but in 1835 the sand was removed, and the building discovered in an almost perfect state.

III. Parochial Chapels.—Structures of the third class, those attached to churches, may be divided into several sections, according as they form part of the main building above ground, or are connected with the main building, but distinct from it; and as they are under ground, like vaults.

1. Above Ground and Connected.—One almost unique example falling under this section in very ancient times exists in the church of Romain Motier, where the upper story of the narthex has a small apse on the east, and was therefore probably intended to serve as a chapel; it is nearly square in plan, and divided into three aisles by two ranges of columns supporting groined vaults. As the church of which this forms a part was a large conventual one, this was probably intended to serve as the smaller chapel generally found in convents. The church is believed to date from 753, the narthex to be somewhat later.

2. Above Ground and Separate.—The chapels which belong to this section, viz. those attached to churches, but distinct buildings, are not very numerous, and in most cases their primary object was sepulchral. Such the three attached to the Church of San Lorenzo at Milan would appear to have been, though that on the south may have been a baptistery, and that on the north a porch or vestibule.

The practice of constructing such appendages to a church continued exceptional. None appear on the plan for the monastery of St. Gall, no doubt prepared between 820 and 830; nor do any seem to have formed parts of the minster of Aix-la-Chapelle.

In the East the rule has always been to have only one altar in a church; and chapels have, therefore, rarely formed parts of churches, but are sometimes found attached to them. An instance of the latter would appear to exist in a church of St. Demetrius at Thessalonica; and to the Convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai six chapels are attached on each side of the nave, but these are doubtless not of the original fabric.

3. Subterranean Chapels, or crypts (q. v.). We have probably an instance in the remains of the Basilica of San Stefano, in Via Latina, built by pope Leo I, 440-461, at Rome. Where, however, no chamber existed, a crypt was not constructed. Hence, in the earlier churches of that city, we find no crypt forming part of the original plan, but small excavations under the altar, to receive some holy corpse brought from the extramural cemeteries. In San Apollinare-in-Classe, at Ravenna, a crypt appears as part of the original structure; it consists of a passage running within the wall of the apse, and another passing under the high-altar.

Although French antiquaries (Martigny, Dict. des Antig. Chréti. art. Crypte) have claimed a very high antiquity for crypts under several churches in France, they are probably not structural crypts. Two crypts, however, exist, which were, it would seem, structural; these are those of St. Irenæus (founded in the 4th century) at Lyons, and of St. Victor at Marseilles (5th century).

Two remarkable crypts exist in England, one in the cathedral of Ripon, and the other in the abbey church of Hexham; both attributed to St. Wilfrid (A.D. 670-678). The model which he followed was evidently not the "confessio" of a church, but the cubiculum and galleries of a Roman catacomb. Crypts existed in the Saxon church of Canterbury, in the plan for the Church of St. Gall (made about 800), and there is one in the Church of Brixworth, Northamptonshire. A remarkable crypt, or "confessio," exists under the raised presbytery of the Church of St. Cæcilia at Rome, and apparently dates from the construction of the building by pope Paschal I. (817-824). It consists of a vaulted space south of the altar (the church stands nearly north and south), a passage running round the interior of the apse, and another passage running south from the north end of the former, but stopped by a mass of masonry supporting the high-altar. Within this mass is a sarcophagus, containing the body of the saint. See CON-FESSIO.

4. Sepulchral Chapels, or Mausoleums (q. v.), were constructed at a very early period. The greater part of the chambers in the catacombs near Rome may be considered as belonging to the class of sepulchral chapels. At what time the practice of placing an altar and of celebrating the eucharistic service in a sepulchral chapel was first introduced cannot be stated with precision. As, however, the practice of praying for the dead existed in the 4th and even in the 3d century, it seems not unlikely that the practice of placing altars in sepulchral chapels may have come into use in the former of those periods. Perhaps the earliest undoubted instance of such a chapel is that of the "Templum Probi," a small basilica attached to the exterior of the apse of St. Peter's at Rome, and built by Sixtus Anicius Petronius Probus, who died A.D. 395. See CELLA.

IV. Detached chapel-like buildings not attached to convents, and not sepulchral, are seldom met with, though probably once common. In most instances they have perished either from time or neglect. In the Haurân, however, where since the 6th century the ruined cities have been uninhabited and the country a desert, many buildings which Count de Vogüé (La Syrie Centrale, Avantpropos, p. 8) considers to have been oratories or chapels still exist. A good example of these Kalybés is that of Um-es-Zeitûn, which an inscription engraved on its front shows to have been built in A.D. 282.

Plan of Kalybé.

One example may be mentioned of a detached chapel of an early date, which was not necessarily sepulchral, that, namely, built by pope Damasus (367-385) near the baptistery of the Lateran at Rome, but not now in existence.

Chapelle, Armand Boisbeleau de. See LA CHAPELLE, ARMAND.

Chapelle (de Jumilhac), Pierre Benoit, a French theologian and Benedictine of St. Maur, was born at Saint-Jean-Ligoure. After having been visitor of the province of Bretagne in 1651, of Toulouse in 1654, and assistant of the general of his order in 1657, and also superior of several monasteries, he retired to the abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés, where he ended his days, March 22, 1682. He left La Science et la Pratique du Plain-Chant (Paris, 1677). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chapels, Union, is a name given to those places of worship in which the service of the Church of England is performed in the morning, and the service of Dissenters in the evening.

Chaperon, Nicolas, a French engraver, was born at Chateaudun in 1596, and studied painting under Simon Vouet. He visited Rome for improvement, and remained several years, in which time he published his set of fifty-two plates from the loges of Raphael in the Vatican. The following are some of his original works: The Holy Family; The Virgin Suckling the Infant. He died in 1647. See Spooner.

Chapin, Almon, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Kirkland, N. Y., Nov. 5, 1809. He was very precocious in childhood; experienced conversion at the age of sixteen; began school-teaching three years later, and settled on a farm in Oswego County, in 1835. He was reclaimed from a backslidden state in 1839, licensed to exhort in 1840, and in 1842 entered the Black River Conference. In 1859 he became superannuated, and sustained that relation to the close of his life, Dec. 1, 1878. Mr. Chapin was an excellent preacher and pastor, a judicious counsellor, and a highly esteemed friend. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 59.

Chapin, Alonzo B., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1808 at Somers, Conn. He practiced law for six years, entered the ministry in 1838, and was rector of the Church in South Glastonbury for several years, until about 1856; subsequently he removed to Hartford, to devote himself more especially to literary work, and died there, July 9, 1884. He wrote several works, among them, The Primitive Church (1845);—Gospel Truth (1847);—besides numerous pamphlets and contributions to periodicals. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1859, p. 90; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Chapin, Asahel, a Baptist minister, was born at West Springfield, Mass., July 20, 1804. He graduated at Amherst College in 1829, and at the Newton Theological Institution in 1833. He was ordained at Ashubula, O., Feb. 13, 1834, where he remained about one year and then removed to Buffalo, N. Y., and was pastor in 1836 and 1837; then pastor at Jamestown, from 1837 to 1843; at Tariffville, Conn., in 1846 and 1847; Second West Springfield, Mass., from 1847 to 1849; Second Holyoke, from 1849 to 1852; Galena, Ill., from 1852 to 1856; Vinton, Ia., from 1856 to 1863; Dubuque, from 1863 to 1870. On leaving Dubuque, he removed to Rice, Peace Co., Kansas, where he resided without charge the remainder of his life. See Newton General Catalogue. (J. C. S.)

Chapin, Augustus Lyman, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Springfield, Mass., Jan. 16, 1793. He prepared for college at West Springfield Academy, Albany, N. Y.; graduated at Yale College in 1817; next taught at Georgetown, D. C.; entered Princeton Theological Seminary in 1819, and remained there two years and two months. He was licensed by the New Brunswick Presbytery, Oct. 2, 1822; was a missionary at Manchester, N. Y., and vicinity, in Ontario County, from December, 1822, to October, 1823; was stated supply at Clarkson, at Madison, and at Wolcott, after which, from sickness, he was laid aside for three years. He was ordained at Oxford, N. Y., Sept. 30, 1830, as an evangelist; was stated supply there, 1829-30; at Walton, 1831-33; and at Lexington, from Nov. 15, 1833, to Sept. 19, 1839. After this he served the churches in Galway, West Turin, and Leyden, residing at Amsterdam, from whence he removed to Illinois, and died at Galesburg, Nov. 7, 1878. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1879, p. 15.

Chapin, Edwin Hubbell, D.D., an eminent Universalist minister and lecturer, was born in Union Village, Washington Co., N. Y., Dec. 29, 1814. His parents, who were of New England origin, removed to Bennington, Vt., while he was yet a boy, and he received his early education at the Bennington Seminary. After completing the course prescribed in that institution, he began the study of law in Troy, N. Y. This, however, he soon abandoned, and, removing to Utica, he undertook the duties of assistant editor of The Magazine and Advocate, a periodical devoted to the interests of Universalism. About this time he appears to have determined upon entering the ministry, and in 1837 he was ordained, and began to preach in Richmond, Va., where he was pastor of a congregation composed of both Unitarians and Universalists. Mr. Chapin remained in Richmond until 1840, when he removed to Charlestown, Mass. After six years' service in the latter city, he was called to the charge of the School Street Universalist Church, in Boston, becoming the colleague of the Rev. Hosea Ballou. In 1848 he was invited to the pastorate of the Fourth Universalist Church in New York city. The society was then worshipping in a church at Murray and Church streets. His preaching proved exceedingly popular, the house inadequate to contain those who came to listen, and the congregation removed to a church at Broadway and Twentieth Street. In 1852, the church belonging to the Unitarian society (All-Souls'), under the Rev. Dr. Bellows, in Broadway, between Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets, was purchased. Dr. Chapin's preaching continued to be highly attractive, and his congregation increased largely in numbers, respectability, and wealth. Ultimately the society became established as the Church of the Divine Paternity, in the building at Fifth Avenue and Forty-fifth Street, which was dedicated in 1866. He continued pastor of this congregation until his death, which occurred Dec. 26, 1880, after about two years of illness, during only the latter of which, however, he had been obliged to relinquish his duties.

Although a devoted pastor, Dr. Chapin found time for other public labors. When the lecture system was at the height of its popularity, he was among the most popular of speakers, his services in that capacity being constantly in demand. His pleasing address, his genial and earnest way of considering popular topics, and the excellent didactic quality of his addresses, made him a favorite in all parts of the country. He himself once said jocosely that he lectured for "F. A. M. E.;" that is, as he laughingly explained, for "Fifty And My Expenses." But afterwards he must have received much more than fifty dollars each for his lyceum discourses. Several years before his decease he retired almost wholly from the lecture platform. In 1850 Dr. Chapin went to Europe, having been elected a delegate to the Peace Congress at Frankfort-on-the-Main. Here he made an address, which was received with much approbation. During the war of the Rebellion, he distinguished himself by the ardor of his patriotism. When the flags of the New York regiments were delivered to the keeping of the state, Dr. Chapin delivered an oration of special power and eloquence. Those who were present at the funeral services of Horace Greeley, which were solemnized in Dr. Chapin's church, will well remember the touching remarks which he made, and his pathetic tribute to the memory of his "dear friend" and "honored associate." A deep interest was taken by Dr. Chapin in all charitable and benevolent movements, and he was associated in the management of several of them. He was trustee of the Bellevue Medical College and Hospital. He was also a member of the New York Historical Society and of the Century Club. The Chapin Home for Aged and Indigent Men and Women, in this city, was named in his honor. Few men have been more entirely successful in winning public love and sympathy. His intellectual qualities were of a high order; he was eminently fitted to enjoy social pleasure; and the kindness of his nature made him hosts of friends, and kept them through all vicissitudes. His particular denomination was very fond of him, and rightly considered him one of its foremost men. But he was himself anything but a sectarian, and was willing to co-operate with Christians of all denominations in every good work. He was well known throughout a great part of the country, and universally esteemed and admired.

Dr. Chapin was a strong, powerfully built man, almost six feet in height. He weighed over two hundred pounds when in good health. His broad face and firmly set mouth indicated vigor of intellect and earnestness of purpose. He wore a beard, which was almost white, and his upper lip was shaven. His hair was brown, and his eyes were a light gray.

He published several volumes of Sermons, and among his other printed works are, Crown of Thorns; a Token for the Suffering (1860); Discourses on the Beatitudes (1853); Discourses on the Lord's Prayer (1850); Duties of Young Men (1855); Duties of Young Women (1863); Hours of Communion (1844); Humanity in the City; Discourses; Moral Aspects of City Life; Providence and Life; Sermons; True Manliness; Discourses on the Book of Proverbs; Characters in the Gospels; — and he also compiled, with J. G. Adams, Hymns for Christian Devotion (new edition, 1870). See N. Y. Tribune, Dec. 28, 1880; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Men of the Time, s. v.

Chapin, Harvey (1), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Tyringham, Mass., Oct. 2, 1787. He removed with his parents, at the age of nine, to Paris, N. Y., where he was converted in his eighteenth year. He began exhorting four years later; was ordained deacon in 1818, elder in 1826, and in 1832 entered the Black River Conference. He died Sept. 14, 1861. Mr. Chapin possessed tender sensibilities, a warm, sympathetic heart, sound understanding, and a large stock of energy. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 110.

Chapin, Harvey (2), a Presbyterian minister, was born in the state of New York in 1798. In 1843 he was licensed by Wyoming Presbytery, and stationed at Lancaster Presbyterian Church. In 1855 he removed to the state of Missouri, and organized a Presbyterian Church in the town of Owatouana, over which he was pastor for several years. He removed to Tipton, Mo., in 1865. On July 29, 1866, his residence was burned, and he perished in the flames. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 77.

Chapin, Jason, a Congregational minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1801. He graduated at Amherst College in 1828, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1831; and was ordained Sept. 26 of that year. He labored first as a home missionary, and then became stated supply at Madison, O., until 1833; at Jefferson, in 1834, and thereafter at West Church, Farmington, at the same time teaching, until his death in 1846. See Trien. Cut. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 92.

Chapin, Joel, a Presbyterian minister, graduated at Dartmouth College in 1791, at the age of thirty. After preaching as a missionary at North Bainbridge, N. Y., for a considerable time, he was installed pastor of the Church in that place in 1798, and died there in 1845. Although feeble in health, he was fervent in piety, and eminently skilled in transacting ecclesiastical business. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 141.

Chapin, John Marvin, a Congregational minister, was born at Springfield, Mass., May 15, 1844. He began preparation for college at Westfield Academy, afterwards attended Williston Seminary, then studied under Rev. Henry M. Colton, of Middletown, Conn., and in 1868 graduated at Yale College. For a short time he was clerk in an insurance office in Springfield, but soon after was engaged to preach in North Blandford. In June, 1872, he graduated at the Theological Institute of Connecticut, and then received a call to the old parish church of West Springfield, where he was ordained and installed pastor, June 19 following. He died there, Oct. 25, the same year. See Cong. Quarterly, 1873, p. 439.

Chapin, Pelatiah, A.M., a Baptist minister, was born in 1747 at Belcher, Mass., and at the age of twenty-one became a member of a Congregational Church. Subsequently he was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Windsor, Vt., where he remained about ten years, and then for several years preached in various places in Vermont, Maine, and New Hampshire. In 1806 he became a Baptist, and was reordained June 11 of that year. He continued to labor in different places until about two years before his death, which took place at Compton, N. H., May 22, 1838. Although in his younger days not favored with opportunities for acquiring a finished education, yet he later improved his time and talents for the acquisition of knowledge. (J. C. S.)

Chapin, Seth, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts. He graduated at Brown University in 1808, and spent more than two years in Andover Seminary. He was ordained Jan. 1, 1812; was pastor at Hillsborough, N. H., from 1812 to 1816; occasional preacher at Rowley, Mass., Mansfield, Conn., etc., from 1816 to 1819; pastor at Hanover, Mass., from 1819 to 1824; stated supply at East Haddam, Conn., in 1825; at Hunter, N. Y., from 1825 to 1827; at Attleborough, Mass., for a time; at West Granville, from 1833 to 1835; was without charge from 1835 to 1842; and pastor at Providence, R. I., from 1842 until his death there, April 19, 1850. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 20.

Chapin, Walter, a Congregational minister, was born at West Springfield, Mass., in 1779. He attended the Westfield Academy, and graduated at Middlebury College in 1803. For a year thereafter he was preceptor of the Royalton Academy; and in 1804 and 1805 was tutor in Middlebury College. He afterwards studied theology under Rev. Dr. Lathrop of West Springfield; served as missionary in northern Vermont, and, from 1810, as pastor in Woodstock, Vt.; for seven years, was secretary of the Vermont Domestic Missionary Society; from 1822 to 1827 belonged to the corporation of Middlebury College; from 1821 to 1824 was editor of the Evangelical Monitor; and died July 22, 1827. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 481.

Chapin, William Arms, a Congregational minister, was born at Newport, N. H., Dec. 8, 1790. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1816; taught several years in Virginia; was licensed in 1821, and preached at Craftsbury, Vt., from 1821 to 1827, and at Greensborough from 1835 until his death, Nov. 27, 1850. Mr. Chapin was noted for his imperturbable calmness and for his soundness of judgment. As a preacher he was methodical and slow, and in doctrine a strict Calvinist. See Cong. Quarterly, 1854, p. 158.

Chapin, William Wilberforce, a Congregational missionary, was born at Somers, Conn., Dec. 2, 1836. He graduated at Williams College in 1860, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1863. He was immediately ordained at Somers, and sailed for India, where he rapidly acquired the language, and was assigned a station at Pimplus, fifty miles from Ahmednugger. He died there March 22, 1865. See Cong. Quarterly, 1866, p. 39.

Chaplain is (1) a priest who officiates in a collegiate or private chapel at a particular altar; (2) a clerical vicar or beneficiatus in a foreign cathedral; (3) the domestic preacher of a peer. An archbishop may have eight, a duke or bishop six, a viscount four, the lord chancellor, a baron, and K.G., three, a marquis or earl five, a dowager, the dean of the chapel, the master of the rolls, lord almoner, the lord treasurer, and secretary to the queen, each two; the lord chief-justice of the queen's bench and the warden of the cinque ports each one. (4) Chaplains in ordinary to the queen are priests who serve in rotation as preachers in the chapel royal. The dean of St. Paul's, if a royal chaplain, or if no royal chaplain is present, presides at the opening of each new convocation.

The word chaplain designated an assistant priest, and generally an officiating priest. Their annual wage was six marks, in the 14th century. They were called vice-curates, in absence of the parish priest; the assistant curate was properly called a conduct. They were removable by the rector.

Chaplains at Pisa are divided into two classes: (a) thirty-two participants in the daily distribution, wearing a violet robe, and called chaplains of the Quinterno, from the name of the register-book. They form a college called the Chaplains' University, which is presided over by four superintendents, and has its own chancery seal and buildings. (b) Twenty simple chaplains, without any share in the quotidian, wearing a cowl on the left shoulder; they do not attend the hours, and are incapable of promotion into the staff of the cathedral, but simply serve chantries.

CHAPLAINS, MILITARY (Aumôniers d'Armée). St. Boniface, in his first council in Germany, ordered that every commander should keep a priest to shrieve his soldiers on the eve of a battle. In the time of Charlemagne, and before the battle of Hastings, it was the custom to confess and communicate the troops before an engagement. In nearly all Christian nations chaplains are a regular part of the army staff.

Chaplain, JOHN FRANCIS, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Trappe, Talbot Co., Md., Oct. 16, 1824. He graduated at Dickinson College in 1846, and was soon afterwards converted. Leaving prospects of great promise in secular pursuits, he began to preach in 1851. In 1852 he joined the Philadelphia Conference, in which he spent his life, serving eleven of its best pastorates, and one term as presiding elder. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1876, and was chosen as a reserve delegate three times. He died Aug. 7, 1880. In learning and ability he took high rank, but was so conscientious that he wasted no time on studies other than those relating to the kingdom of God and the spiritual life. His preaching was scriptural, methodical, and simple. His ministry was a labor of love, and his death-scene most glorious. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 73.

Chaplet. It was anciently the practice of some churches to crown the newly baptized with a chaplet or garland of flowers.

Chaplin, Alexander, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, was born at Barnhills, parish of Bervie, March 17, 1719. He took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1737, and was licensed to preach in 1743; presented by the king to the living at Kinnell in 1754, and ordained. He died May 6, 1813, leaving an Account of the Parish. See Fasts Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 801.

Chaplin, Benjamin, a Congregational minister, was born in that part of Pomfret, Conn., which is now called Hampton, Sept. 16, 1733. He graduated at Yale College in 1763; studied divinity at Sutton, Mass., with Rev. Dr. Hall; was ordained pastor of the Second Church in Sutton, now Millbury, Nov. 14, 1765, and was dismissed March 6, 1792. Subsequently he lived with his children, and finally died at Hardwick,

Dec. 18, 1822. He published several controversial works on doctrinal subjects, among them a volume entitled, On the Sacraments. He was a man of power and originality. See Hist. of Mendon Association, p. 103. (J. C. S.)

Chapman, Abner W., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in New Cambridge, N. Y., June 9, 1812. He was left an orphan at the age of four, and wholly to his own discretion when fourteen, but acquired a good education. For some time he was principal of the preparatory school of Augusta College, Kentucky; afterwards master of a school in Vicksburg, Miss.; and finally president of a female institution, under the patronage of the Mississippi Conference. In 1835 he was licensed to preach; and in 1839 united with the Mississippi Conference, labored two years, and then located; again entered the effective ranks in 1849, and labored with great zeal and fidelity until his death, June 21, 1850. Mr. Chapman was diligent, greatly beloved, and eminently useful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1850, p. 308.

Chapman, A. H., a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, son of Rev. Alexander Chapman, and brother of Rev. B. C. Chapman, pastor of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in Selma, Ala., was born Sept. 13, 1813. He was received by the Logan Presbytery, was licensed and ordained, and devoted himself mainly to itinerant preaching in the upper portion of his presbytery. He died Aug. 22, 1849, in Greene County, Tenn. See Beard, Biographical Sketches, 2d series, p. 173.

Chapman, Alexander (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1695, was licensed to preach in 1701, was called to the living at Moneydie in 1702, and to Dunbarny in 1716, but the presbytery refused consent. He died Aug. 3, 1716, aged forty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 653.

Chapman, Alexander (2), a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, was born in Bucks County, Pa., Jan. 2, 1776. When he was twenty years old he removed with his parents to Tennessee. In 1805 he went to Kentucky, and was received by the Cumberland Presbytery as a candidate for the ministry, at the Red River Meeting House. In March, 1811, he was licensed by the new Cumberland Presbytery, which met for the first time at Big Spring, Wilson Co., Tenn. He was ordained at Mt. Moriah, Logan Co., Ky., in February, 1813. Under instructions from the Missionary Board he went to Illinois, in 1820, preaching in Gallatin, White, Wayne, and Edwards counties. Mr. Chapman was one of the missionaries sent by the General Assembly, in 1831, to western Pennsylvania, and labored there about two months, but returned for a short time in 1832. He died Sept. 15, 1834. See Beard, Biographical Sketches, 2d series, p. 148.

Chapman, Benjamin, a Congregational minister, was a graduate of Princeton College. He was ordained March 17, 1756, and settled over the Congregational Church at Southington, Conn. He was dismissed from his charge Sept. 28, 1774, but continued to reside in Southington until his death, June 22, 1786. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Chapman, Daniel, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Sheffield in 1799. At the age of fifteen he united with the Church. Through the help of James Montgomery, the poet, and others, he was educated at Edinburgh University, where he honorably acquitted himself. On leaving the university, in 1826, he was received by the conference and sent to Burslem. He died, after much suffering, Nov. 10, 1856. He was a man of blandness of manners, kindness, high sense of honor, piety, and many eccentricities. His sermons were original, but unduly exuberant in language. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1857.

XI.—29

Chapman, Edward, an English Wesleyan preacher, was admitted to the ministry in 1804 at Cardiff, became a supernumerary at Croydon in 1840, and died Dec. 9, 1858, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. He was of devout and gentle spirit, walking with God. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1859.

Chapman, Epaphras, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Connecticut. He graduated from Yale College in 1816; studied theology for more than a year at Princeton Theological Seminary, and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 6, 1820. He became a missionary to the Osage Indians on the Arkansas river, and died Jan. 7, 1825. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 22.

Chapman, Ezekiel I., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Saybrook, Conn., Aug. 23, 1781. He was educated at Yale College, and during his course there was converted and united with the college church. In 1801 he joined the Congregational Association, and entered upon his labors as an evangelist in Ohio. In 1804 he was called to the First Presbyterian Church in East Bloomfield, N. Y., and he subsequently labored in the churches of Lima, Bristol, Livonia, Lebanon, Manlius, and Oneida Lake, all within the state of New York. He died at Oneida Lake, Madison Co., Aug. 1, 1866. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 78.

Chapman, Frederic William, a Congregational minister, was born at Canfield, Trumbull Co., O., Nov. 17, 1806. He graduated from Yale College in 1828, and from Yale Theological Seminary in 1832; and was pastor of the Church in Stratford, Conn., from 1832 to 1839, at Deep River until 1850, and at South Glastonbury for the next four years. From 1854 to 1863 he was principal of the high-school at Ellington, acting-pastor of the Church at West Stafford from 1856 to 1861, and at Bolton from 1861 to 1864. In the last-named year he became acting pastor of the Union Church, East Hampton, from which he went in 1866 to the Church at Prospect. In 1871 he removed to Rocky Hill, where he resided, without charge, until his death, July 21, 1876. He was a diligent student of the history of New England, and published, Genealogy of the Chapman Family (1854):—Genealogy of the Pratt Family (1864):—Genealogy of the Tronbridge Family (1872):—Genealogy of the Buckingham Family (eod.):—Genealogy of the Coit Family (1874):—Genealogy of the Bulkley Family (1875). He was a member of the New England Genealogical Society, Connecticut Historical Society, New Haven Colony Historical Society, and Buffalo Historical Society. See Cong. Quarterly, 1877, p. 412.

Chapman, George, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1764; appointed to the living at Kinfauns in 1765, and ordained; kept an academy for young men, and died Oct. 30, 1795, aged fifty-six years. He was a man "who had kindness of heart, integrity of conduct, gentleness of manners, cheerfulness of temper, and liberality of spirit." He published An Account of the Parish, and edited Original Essays and Translations (Edinb. 1780). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 646.

Chapman, George T., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, of the diocese of Massachusetts, resided in Pittsfield in 1854; was officiating minister in 1857 at Lee, where he remained until 1859, when he removed to Newburyport, residing there during the rest of his life. He died Oct. 18, 1872, aged eighty-four years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 134.

Chapman, James (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Inverness, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1695; was licensed to preach in 1699, appointed minister at Calder the same year, and ordained; transferred to Cromdale in 1702, and died Dec. 30, 1787, aged about sixty-three years. He wrote a Wesleyan Branch, Family of Grant, which is preserved in the Advocates' Library.

Library, Edinburgh. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 281, 248.

Chapman, James (2), a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Elizabethtown, N. J., May 15, 1785. His early education was acquired at the academy of the late Dr. Barry, and subsequently he graduated from Princeton College. He pursued a theological course under the Rev. Dr. Hobart, afterwards bishop of New York; was ordained deacon in 1807, and was immediately engaged as assistant to the rector of Trinity Church, New York city, continuing in this relation until 1809, when he accepted a call to St. Peter's, Perth Amboy, N. J. In the following year he was ordained priest, and continued to serve St. Peter's until 1842, when he resigned. For twenty years he was a member of the Standing Committee, for a still longer period the treasurer of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and was frequently a delegate to the General Convention. During the latter years of his life he officiated gratuitously in Trinity Church, Woodbridge. He died at Perth Amboy, April 6, 1857. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1857, p. 310.

Chapman, James Dyer, a Congregational minister, was born at Columbia, Conn., in 1799. He graduated from Yale College in 1826, and from the Yale Divinity School in 1830. From September, 1832, to September, 1833, he supplied the Church in Prospect, Conn. After preaching for a few years in different places without settlement, he was ordained pastor of the Church in Wolcott, Oct. 25, 1837, and remained until Nov. 4, 1840. His strong, outspoken anti-slavery principles aroused prejudice against him on the part of some of the community. The last ten years of his life he preached in Cummingtown, Mass., where he died, Dec. 19, 1854. See Hist. of Wolcott, p. 200.

Chapman, Jedediah, a Presbyterian pioneer minister, was born at Haddam, Conn., Sept. 27, 1741. He graduated at Yale College in 1762, and in 1766 he was licensed and installed as pastor of the Church in Orange, N. J. He adhered to the cause of American liberty during the Revolutionary War. In 1800 he was appointed missionary to western New York, and removed to Geneva, where he passed the remainder of his life, being installed pastor there in 1812. He died May 22, 1813. He published five Sermons on Baptism. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 95.

Chapman, John, B.D., an English missionary to India, was born in 1813. He graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1836, and was subsequently elected to a fellowship in that college, which he resigned in 1840, and was sent out by the Church Missionary Society to take charge of the Cottayam College in Travancore. After ten years of efficient service, greatly elevating the character of the institution, he removed to Madras, to the supervision of the Church Missionary Seminary in that city. Ill-health obliged him in 1853 to return to his native land. Soon after his arrival he was appointed secretary of the society, which position he held till his death, at Islington, England, Dec. 27, 1862. Mr. Chapman contributed largely to the theological literature of the day, and in 1861 published a very able Answer to the Essays and Reviews. See Appleton's Annual Cyclopædia, 1862, p. 695.

Chapman, Joseph (1), an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted at an early age, travelled one year in the ministry in England, was sent in 1817 to the West Indies, and died at Tortola, July 21, 1821. See Minutes of the Brit. Conference, 1822.

Chapman, Joseph (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was converted at the age of twenty, commenced to travel in the ministry in 1810, and labored for six years, when bodily affliction compelled him to desist from active work. He died Sept. 20, 1833.

Chapman, Joseph Miller, an English Baptist minister, was born at Frome, Jan. 8, 1801. In early life he united with the Baptist Church in his native place, and entered upon a career of preparatory study at the Bristol College in 1820, on completing which he acted as pastor of the Church in Hillisley, Gloucestershire, about two years, and then accepted a call to Yeovil, where he was ordained, Oct. 26, 1825. In the midst of his usefulness he died, in the fall of 1842. See (English) Baptist Magazine, 1842, p. 569-572. (J. C. S.)

Chapman, Josephus, an English Congregational minister, was born at Greenhithe, in 1791. He joined the Church in his youth; became a diligent Sunday-school teacher and a zealous tract distributor; received his collegiate education as a non-resident student at Hoxton College, and was ordained at Ashford about 1816. After three years he removed to Hurstmoor, Sussex; subsequently labored seven years at Bromyard, Herefordshire; a few years as travelling agent for the British and Foreign Sailors' Society, and finally at Ramsgate, where he died, May 8, 1873. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 317.

Chapman, Lewis, a Scotch clergyman, had a bursary for study at the Glasgow University, and studied also at Edinburgh and Leyden; was licensed to preach in 1728, and presented to the living at Alvie the same year; transferred to Petty in 1738, and died April 19, 1741, aged thirty-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 229, 270.

Chapman, Nathan, a Baptist minister, was born in October, 1797. He was converted at the age of twenty, and in 1830 was ordained at East Ware, N. H. During the forty-five years of his ministerial work he was pastor of nine churches, three times in Pocomet, Mass. His last settlement was in Barnstable. In 1854 on account of feeble health, he withdrew to Dennis where he died, Aug. 11, 1883. See The Watchman, Aug. 28, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Chapman, Nathaniel, a Congregational minister, was born at Exeter, N. H., in 1789. He removed to Mt. Vernon, Me., in 1800; graduated at Bangor Theological Seminary in 1820, and was ordained pastor of the Church in Bristol, Me., in 1824, where he remained until 1833. His other charges were as follows: Maine: Boothbay, 1833; Camden, 1835; Warren, 1837; 1852; Thordike, Freedom, and Pittston, 1856, where he died, April 1, 1858. He was a man of sound judgment and eminently humble; his preaching was earnest and practical. See Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 97.

Chapman, Philip, an English Wesleyan missionary, was appointed to Jamaica, W. I., in 1836, after having spent two years at the Theological Institution. He died May 17, 1843, aged thirty-three years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1843; Bleby, Roman Without Fiction, p. 513.

Chapman, Richard, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Patrington, Yorkshire, in 1815. He was converted when thirteen; was accepted as a candidate for the ministry in 1838; spent three years at the Theological Institution at Hoxton; was ordained in 1843; was appointed two years later the first Methodist missionary to the seamen on the Thames, and died at Lewes or Eastbourne (his last station), Feb. 26, 1871. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1871, p. 22.

Chapman, Robert Hett, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, son of Rev. Jedediah Chapman, was born at Orange, N. J., March 2, 1771. He graduated at New Jersey College in 1789, and, after studying with his father, was licensed to preach by the New York Presbytery in 1793. In 1796 he became pastor at Kalamazoo, N. J., and in 1801, at Cambridge, N. Y. In 1811 he was elected president of the University of North Carolina, and resigned that position in 1817, after which he was pastor of Bethel Church, Va., and in 1823 removed to the vicinity of Winchester. In 1830 he settled at Covington, Tenn. He died June 18, 1833. Dr. Chap man published only a few Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 95.

Chapman, Thomas, D.D., LL.D., an English clergyman, was born at Billingham, Durham County, in 1717. He was educated at Richmond School, in Yorkshire, and afterwards obtained a fellowship at Christ College, Cambridge, in 1741. In 1746 he was chosen master of Magdalen College. In 1748 he served as vice-chancellor, and was appointed one of his majesty's chaplains. In 1749 he was rector of Kirby-over-Blower, in Yorkshire. In 1750 he was presented by the king to a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Durham, and in 1758 was appointed official to the dean and chapter. He died at Cambridge, June 9, 1760. His principal production is an Essay on the Roman Senate (1750). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Chapman, William (1), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1698; called to the living at Glenisla in 1699; ordained in 1700, and died in 1717. See Fusti Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 748.

Chapman, William (2), an English Independent, son of the Rev. Samuel Chapman, of Yoxford, Suffolk, was educated by his father, by Mr. Richard Frankland, and at the Rathmell Academy. About the year 1699 he was chosen first pastor of the Church at Lower Rotherhithe, Southwark, but removed to Bethnal-Green in 1703, and died there in 1738. He was a man of great learning and piety, and an excellent preacher. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 368.

Chapman, William (3), an English Congregational minister, born in 1777, was brought up to business in London. He early devoted himself to the ministry, was educated at the College of Newport-Pagnell, and ordained pastor of the Independent Church at Sandwich, Kent, Oct. 30, 1800. A few years afterwards he began to preach in the chapel in Greenwich Road, of which he was constituted pastor, March 29, 1808. He died July 26, 1848. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1848, p. 216.

Chapman, William (4), an English Methodist preacher, and one of the pioneers in the New Connection, was born in 1787, and was converted in early life. He entered the ministry at the age of twenty, travelled for twenty-three years in eighteen circuits, his services being acceptable and useful. He became a supernumerary in 1831. In 1828 he was president of the Conference. His last residence was Sowood, Stainland, Halifax, where he died, June 4, 1872. See Minutes of the Conference.

Chapman, William H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Maryland. He was converted in early life, and in 1821 joined the Baltimore Conference, in which he served the Church with diligence and considerable success until his death, April 24, 1828. Mr. Chapman was plain in his manners, searching and powerful in his appeals, energetic in duty, and devout in life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1829, p. 37.

Chapman, William Rogers, a Congregational minister, was born in Maine in 1812. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1837, studied theology in Andover Theological Seminary, and graduated from the theological department of Yale College in 1841. He was ordained Sept. 8 of that year; was pastor of Garden Street Church, Boston, Mass., until 1847, and from 1844, in connection with Green Street Church; of Eighth Street Church, New York city, from 1847 to 1849; of the Presbyterian Church of Aurora, N. Y., from 1850 to 1854; and stated supply at Hanover, Mass., thereafter, until his death, Oct. 25, 1855. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 149.

Chaponel (D'Antescourt), RAYMOND, a French theologian and Augustinian monk, was born in 1636. He was canon of the congregation of Sainte-Geneviève, and prior-pastor of Saint-Eloy of Roissy. He died Nov.

25, 1700, leaving L'Usage de Célébrer le Service Divin en Langue non Vulgaire (Paris, 1687, 12mo):—Histoire des Chanoines (ibid. 1699, 12mo):—Examen des Voies Intérieures (ibid. 1700, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chapot, Jean, a French theologian of the order of St. Francis, a native of Châlons, in Burgundy, died Feb. 27, 1631, leaving Vie et Miracles de Saint François de Paul (Nancy, 1621). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chapot, Pierre, a French martyr, was proof-reader to a printer in Paris. He went through France with copies of the Holy Scripture, which he distributed among the people. His great zeal caused him to be apprehended by John Andre, and, being brought before the commissaries, he promptly rendered an account of his faith. He was examined by three Sorbonne doctors, MM. Nicolas Clerici, John Picard, and Nicolas Maillard, and was condemned to be burned in Paris in 1546. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 402.

Chappell, John, a distinguished member of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Gloucestershire, England, June 24, 1765, and came with his wife and children to Philadelphia, June 15, 1795. Having filled the offices of class-leader, steward, member of the book committee, and delegate to the annual and general conferences, he died Oct. 23, 1853, at the age of eighty-eight, full of grace. See Colhouer, Founders of the Meth. Prot. Church, p. 325.

Chappell, John B., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Lincoln County, Ga., in 1789. He was brought up by a godly mother; was converted in 1812; entered the army in 1814; at the close of the war became a local preacher, and finally, in 1819, entered the South Carolina Conference, wherein he labored with much acceptance and success. He died Oct. 21, 1855. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1855, p. 623.

Chappuis, JEAN SAMUEL, a Swiss Congregational minister, was born July 16, 1809, at Rivaz, near Lake Geneva. He received his education at the Vevay College, the Academy of Lausanne (1824), and Heidelberg. His first work in the ministry was as curate at Montreux and Basle (1833). In 1835 he went to Berlin, to prepare himself for the post of theological professor in his native canton, and in 1838 was appointed to the chair of systematic theology in the Academy of Lausanne. The thesis he wrote on this occasion, L'Ancien Testament Considéré dans ses Rapports avec le Christianisme (Lausanne, 1838), is a masterly production, bringing out into great prominence the pedagogic character of the old economy. When the revolution occurred in Vaud in 1845, M. Chappuis quit his post, and at once set about forming the Free Church. As soon as this infant Church had determined to have a faculty of theology, M. Chappuis was appointed professor of systematic theology and of New Test. exegesis. This important post he held till his death, April 8, 1870. M. Chappuis, in profile, closely resembled Calvin; he possessed also many of the qualities which distinguished the great Reformer. Although professor of systematic theology over twenty years, he had no complete system of theology, properly so called. He believed that Christianity must be approached by the path of moral experience. The great point is to be in living relation with Christ. We are not saved by dogmas, but by a living being. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1871, p. 308; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; and the Life of Chappuis, by Monastier and Rambert (Lausanne, 1871).

Chapter. We add some further particulars on this subject:

"As properly applied to a cathedral, this term denotes a sacred congregation of persons set apart for the worship of God in principal churches, and forming the council of the president of the foundation, from whom, as their head (caput), the chapter (capitulum) derives its name. As monks and canons regular had their chapters, so when secular canons had their common table divided into separate prebends they were formed into chapters, 'little heads,' as the bishop was the principal head. The monks and regulars are also thought to have received this name from the daily reading of the little chapter, a portion of their rule, in their assembly, about the 7th century, when the word occurs in the capitulars of Charlemagne and the Councils of Aix and Mayence, instead of the older term 'congregation,' employed by St. Benedict and bishop Julian of Marseilles in 480. Properly speaking, a chapter was in a cathedral church; a convent was a church of regulars, and a college an inferior church, with its members living in common. A chapter cannot be composed of less than three persons. Usually it assembled on every Saturday, and was then often called a parliament; now it meets ordinarily once in every quarter. A curious complaint was made in the 15th century at Lincoln that the dean brought armed followers into chapter. At Rouen it was convened annually; at Mayence four times a year. In the new foundations, forthrightly chapters are enjoined. The bishop is the principal head; the dean the numeral head. Its members are canons, having a stall in choir and a vote in chapter, with prebends, a foundation and estate, and the right of a common seal, being assembled under their head, and convened by the sound of a bell. Absent canons are represented by proxies. It can enact statutes, which must be ratified by the visitor, and has all the rights of a parish; and before it and the dean all members of the body are to be tried. It forms the bishop's council, and must furnish assistants to him at ordinations, and on the vacancy of a see exercises episcopal jurisdiction. There are various kinds of chapters:

"1. A close chapter, where the number of members is limited.

"2. The lesser or ordinary chapter, composed of residentiaries only, at least two thirds of the number, and meeting under the dean.

"3. The great or extraordinary chapter, consisting of all the canons, resident or non-resident, convened by the bishop. It was also called the Pentecostal chapter, because it met at Whitsuntide, and continued to do so at Salisbury until 1811. At Hereford it is convoked twice a year; and at Chichester, and in other cathedrals, it is still convened on special occasions. Sometimes there were two regular chapters in one church, as at St. Ambrose's, Milan, and St. Augustine's, Pavia, each having its own superior; or two churches constituted the bishop's collective chapter, as at Bath and Wells, Lichfield and Coventry, Hamburg and Bremen."

CHAPTER, MONASTIC. This was held in winter after tierce, but after prime in summer. At the sound of a bell, rung by the prior, the monks entered two and two, and bowed to a cross in the centre of the room, to the superior's chair, and to one another. The ordinary business transacted comprised reading the martyrology, announcement of coming festivals, reading the rule, or, on Sundays and holy-days, a homily of the fathers, commemoration of the departed and living benefactors, nomination of celebrants and the officiating priest for the week ensuing, public confession of faults, infliction of penance and discipline, and once a year recital of charters. The novice was admitted in chapter; the superior was elected, and the great officers of the house were confirmed in it; the inventory of the library was also carefully inspected in chapter every Lent. In the secular chapter, held after prime, all business connected with the church, the services, and lands was transacted, and all disputes determined. Every canon had his voice in chapter, and his stall in choir. In 1279 there were two general archidiaconal chapters and four quarterly ruridecanal chapters held yearly in England.

CHAPTER, THE LITTLE. See CAPITULARIES.

Chapter-house. The following details further illustrate this subject:

"The conventual or capitular parliament-house, rare in France and Germany, was used daily by the regulars, and on every Saturday by the secular canons. In it also the bishop convened the community at his visitation or diocesan synod. It derived its name from the little chapters or rubrics of the statutes being read over in it in the monastery, it is said. At Valencia and Hereford the pulpit for the theological lecture stood in it until recently. In the 9th century, the north alley served for the purpose of the chapter-house, as at St. Gall; but in the 10th century a separate building was erected at Fontenelle, and Edward the Confessor built one of a circular form at Westminster. The chapter-house in a convent was almost invariably an oblong, sometimes terminating in an apse, and round or polygonal in a secular establishment. The latter form may have been suggested by the column with radiating arches which is found at the east end of an apsidal crypt, or by the Italian baptistery, in which councils were sometimes held. The rectangular form was more convenient for the judicial character of the building, as the polygonal was for synodical meetings convened by the diocesan. There are two apparent, but not real exceptions; at Exeter, where the chapter-house is oblong, and the Benedictines were replaced by canons; and at Worcester, where it is polygonal without and circular within, and canons were superseded by Benedictines. At Bari, the baptistery, round on the exterior, is twelve-sided within, each compartment formerly having a figure of an apostle. At Wells, Lincoln, Lichfield, Southwell, York, and Elgin, this council-chamber stands on the north side of the church, connected with it by a passage for marshalling processions; but at Salisbury it occupies its normal position in convents, the centre of the east side of the cloister. At Chichester and St. David's it is in an upper story, adjoining the transept. In the secular canons' chapter-house a large crucifix stood in the centre, near a pulpit for sermons and reading, and stalls were ranged round the sides of the walls; the dignitaries occupying the east end, and the canons sitting in order of installation, reckoning from the east to the west. In the Benedictine houses the walls were generally arched to form stalls, and a large coffer, called the trunk, was placed at the entrance, as the place of offenders. The abbot's or prior's chair fronted it, and every monk who approached it performed the venia, an inclination of reverence. The apse of the chapter-house possibly contained an altar, since the building was regarded as only less sacred than the church, and a light burned constantly in it, and before the door. At Tongres the altar remains; and at Exeter the chapel of the Holy Ghost adjoins it in the usual position of the slype. At Belvoir and St. Paul's it stood in the centre of the cloisters. At Bristol, Exeter, Beaulieu, Haughmond, and Chester, a large vestibule, with a central door and windows opening eastward, is built in front of the chapter-house, in order to afford additional accommodation to the general assemblies of the orders. The Cistercians had sermons in the chapter-house; and, like the other regular orders, admitted novices, administered punishment, and transacted general business in this room, which abroad was known as the chapter-hall. It was a peculiarity with the Cistercians to subdivide their chapter-houses into alleys by ranges of pillars, and between it and the transept they invariably placed a large ambury or cloister library; and the Claustrines at Wenlock followed the example; but in the Benedictine houses the slype, or way to the cemetery, always intervenes in this position. Burials were permitted in the chapter-house to bishops, priors, and eminent laymen, before interments within the church itself were suffered to be made. At Durham and Norwich penitential cells adjoined the chapter-house, the offenders being at once taken to them, after sentence had been delivered."

Chapter (or Conventual) Mass is the high-mass or mass of the day, usually sung before 10 A.M.; in France the hour is 8 or 9 A.M.

Chapuzeau, SAMUEL, a Swiss Protestant divine, was born at Geneva of a poor family originally from Poitiers. After practicing as a physician, he was appointed preceptor and governor in the royal family. He died at Zell in 1701, leaving a Traité de la Manière de Prêcher, and several geographical works, among them Tavernier's Voyages (1682). See ROSE, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Charak Pujah is one of the most popular festivals in Eastern India. It is held in honor of Siva (q. v.) in his character of Maha Kali, or Time, the great destroyer of all things; and by association of thought the goddess Kali (q. v.) has come to occupy a most conspicuous place in this annual festival. The name of the festival is derived from chakra, a disk or wheel, in allusion to the circle performed in the rite of scincing, which forms so prominent a part of the observances. An upright pole, twenty or thirty feet in height, is planted in the ground. Across the top of it, moving freely on a pin or pivot, is placed horizontally a long beam. From one end of this transverse beam a rope is suspended, with two hooks affixed to it, which are fastened into the fleshy parts of the back of the devotee, while another rope at the opposite end of the beam serves to whirl the machine around, and carry the victim in a circle swiftly through the air. As this is an exercise of great merit to the devotee, he endures the torture as long as possible, usually from ten minutes to half an hour.

Thousands of these swinging posts are in operation at one time in Bengal. If the ligaments of the back of any one should prove too weak for the strain resulting from the very rapid motion, and the poor victim should be dashed in pieces, his violent death is considered by the spectators the just punishment of crimes committed in a previous state of existence. Other practices equally cruel are carried on at these festivals, with the hope of obtaining the favor of their deity. See Duff, India and India Missions.

Charalampes (or Charilampes), Saint, is the name of two early Christian martyrs:

1. Bishop of Magnesia, who was stripped of his priestly attire and flayed alive. The prefect Lucian tried to tear him to pieces himself, but his own hands were by some accident cut off on the spot, and we are told that the saint prayed and made his persecutor whole. The licitor Porphyrius, and Adametus, and three women who saw it, thereupon believed, but the ungrateful prefect had them all beheaded. Charalampes is commemorated Feb. 10, according to Basil's Menology.

2. Martyr at Nicomedia, with Eusebius, Romanus, Mennius, Christina, and many others, probably in the persecution of Diocletian. May 30 is the day assigned for his commemoration in Basil's Menology.

Charan Dasia is one of the Vaishnava (q. v.) sects among the Hindûs. It was instituted by Charan Das, a merchant of the Dhushar tribe, who resided at Delhi in the reign of the second Alemgir. They assert the pre-eminence of faith above every other distinction. They require no particular qualification of caste, order, or sex for their teachers; and they attach great importance to morality. Their decalogue is as follows: 1, not to lie; 2, not to revile; 3, not to speak harshly; 4, not to discourse idly; 5, not to steal; 6, not to commit adultery; 7, not to offer violence to any created thing; 8, not to imagine evil; 9, not to cherish hatred; 10, not to indulge in conceit or pride. These sectaries consist of two classes, the clerical and the secular. The latter are chiefly of the mercantile order; but the former lead a mendicant and ascetic life, and are distinguished by wearing yellow garments, a single streak of sandal-color down the forehead, a necklace and rosary of Tulasi beads, and a small pointed cap, around the lower part of which they wear a yellow turban. The authorities of the sect are the Sri Bhagavat and Gita.

Charashim (or Craftamen), VALLEY OF. Lieutenant Conder suggests (Tent-work, ii, 335) that a trace of this name still lingers at Khurbet Hirsha, a ruin on the edge of the great valley east of Lydda, in the general region indicated by the scriptural notices.

Chardaniel, in Jewish mythology, is an angel, ruler of the firmament, who is six million times larger than other angels. He continually irradiates light in twelve brilliant rays.

Chardin, JEAN, a famous French Oriental traveller, was born at Paris, Nov. 16, 1643. While yet scarcely of age he went to the East Indies to buy diamonds. From Surat he went to Persia, and remained six years at Ispahan. In 1670 he returned home, but went back again to Persia the next year, where, as well as in India, he remained until 1681. After his return he was knighted by Charles II of England, and was sent as plenipotentiary of England and agent of the Anglo-East-Indian Company to Holland. He died at London, Jan. 15, 1713. He is the author of a highly esteemed work, Voyage en Perse et Autres Lieux de l'Orient (Lond. 1686, 1711; new edition by L. Langles, Paris, 1811, 10 vols.). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol.

Chardon, Charles (or Claude) Mathias, a French theologian, was born at Ivoi-Carignan, Lorraine, Sept. 22, 1695. He took the vows of the reformed order of St. Benedict, July 3, 1712, in the Abbey of St. Vanne, at Verdun. He taught rhetoric, philosophy, and theology at Novi-les-Moines, near Kethel; was acquainted with Greek, Hebrew, and Syriac, and had a profound knowledge of ecclesiastical history. He was dispossessed in 1730, because of his opposition to the bull Unigenitus, and died at St. Arnould de Metz, Oct. 20, 1771, leaving, Histoire des Sacrements, a very elaborate work (Paris, 1745, 6 vols. 12mo; translated into Italian, Brescia, 1758, 3 vols. 4to):—Histoire des Variations dans la Discipline de l'Eglise (MS.):—Contre les Incrédules Modernes (MS.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chardon, Gervais, a French theologian, born at Froid-Fond, near Château-Gontier, taught by turns philosophy and theology at Saint-Nicolas of Angers. He was banished July 9, 1676, to Riom, and died Dec. 21, 1686, protesting with energy against the triumph of the new Pelagians. He left, unpublished, an extensive course of theology. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chardon (or Charldon), John, D.D., an English prelate, was educated at Exeter College, Oxford, and consecrated bishop of Down and Connor in 1596. He published a number of Sermons (1580-95). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Chardon (de Lugny), Zacharie, a French theologian, was born in 1643. His family was Protestant, but when quite young he became one of the pages of Louis XIV, and Bossuet effected his conversion to Catholicism. Chardon took orders, and was attached to the parish church of St. Sulpice. He died June 23, 1733, leaving, Traité de la Religion Chrétienne (Paris, 1697, 2 vols. 12mo):—Recueil des Falsifications que les Ministres de Genève ont Faites de l'Ecriture Sainte (ibid. 1707, 12mo):—Nouvelle Méthode pour Réfuter l'Etablissement des Eglises Prétendues Réformées (ibid. 1731, 12mo):—Remarques Historiques sur l'Eglise de St. Sulpice (published in the Journal des Sçavans, 1697, p. 179). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charelli, BENEDETTO, an Italian theologian, who lived in the first part of the 18th century, wrote Memorie Sacre Della Città di Messina (Messina, 1705, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charency, GUILLAUME, a French theologian, born in Saint-Sauveur de Cresset, lived in the former part of the 17th century. He became canon of his native place, and wrote, La Clef du Sens Littéral et Moral de Quelques Psaumes de David. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charentinus (Chareternus), eighth bishop of Cologne, succeeded Domitian, and was followed by Ebregesilus. The date assigned to him is 570, and he is commemorated by Fortunatus in an elegiac poem.

Charenton, JOSEPH NICOLAS, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Blois in 1659. He entered the Jesuit order in 1675, and went to India as a missionary. After his return to France he lived successively at Orleans, Nantes, and Paris. He died in the latter city, Aug. 10, 1735, leaving, Entretiens de l'Âme (from Thomas à Kempis, Paris, 1706):—a French translation of the General History of Spain of P. Mariana, with notes and maps (ibid. 1725, 6 vols.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charge is, in ecclesiastical terminology, (1) a sermon preached by the bishop to his clergy; (2) among the Dissenters, a sermon preached to a minister at his ordination, generally by some aged or able divine, and containing a view of the Christian ministry in its nature, duties, trials, and encouragements.

Chariatho is the name of two or three noted persons in early Christian records:

1. One of the bishops addressed (A.D. 452) by Leo of Bourges, Victorius of Le Mans, and Eustochius of Tours, in a letter ordaining that, as the emperors have given the bishops the power of judging civil cases, ecclesiastics shall appeal to them, and never to lay judges, under pain of excommunication. The teaching of the letter was adopted in a council held at Angers the next year, in which Chariatho took part (Tillemont, Mémoires, xvi, 394; Labbe, Concil. iii, 1420; iv, 1020).

2. The name Chariatho occurs in the Jerusalem Martyrology as belonging to a martyr in Syria with Martin and Peter, March 5, and to a martyr at Rome, with Stercorius, Clement, Julian, Emeritus, etc., July 25.

Charioles was a priest in the 5th century, rebuked by St. Nilus of Sinai (Epist. iii, 243) for imposing hard penances on an humble penitent named Faustinus, and refusing him absolution till they were performed.

Charilæa, in Greek religious usage, was an annual festival. At Delphi a threatening famine had broken out, during which Charila, a poor orphan, came to the king and begged for bread. As the king had already distributed all he had, he, in an angry mood, threw his shoe at the girl, upon which she hung herself in despair. But the misery became still greater, for infectious diseases made their appearance. Hereupon the Pythian priestess was sought for advice; her answer was that the plague would only subside when sacrifices of atonement should be offered to the shade of the murdered girl. This was done, and the evil disappeared. After that time these festivities were repeated every nine years, in which the king took the lead, distributing provisions to natives and strangers, and finally threw some at the image of Charila, together with his shoe, after which he had the figure buried with a rope around its neck.

Charimír, Saint, bishop of Verdun, succeeded St. Airic in the bishopric in 588. He was referendarius to king Childebert II.

Charioteers. As the public games were considered by the early Church to be intimately associated with idolatry, or comprised in the pomp and service of the devil, which every Christian was expected to renounce at baptism, charioteers were commanded to leave their calling or be refused baptism. In case one afterwards returned to it, he was considered as renouncing his baptismal covenant, and thereupon discarded, as an apostate and relapsor from Christian communion. See Bingham, Christian Antiquities, bk. xi, ch. v; bk. xvi, ch. iv. The extensive prevalence of these heathen games accounts for the prominent mention of this class of persons. The men who followed this vocation were commonly more or less disreputable, and had been excluded, even by Roman law, from most of the privileges of citizenship (Tertull. De Spectac. c. 22). It was, through the eager excitement which attended it, incompatible with meditation and prayer. See Constitut. Apostol. viii, 32. When the games of the circus were reproduced under Christian emperors, the rigor of the Church's discipline was probably relaxed.

Charis (grace), in the system of Valentinus, is an alternative name with Enneæ and Sige, for the consort of the primary Æon, Bythos (Irenæus, i, 4). The name expresses that aspect of the absolute Greatness in which it is regarded not as a solitary monad, but as imparting some of its perfection to beings of which it is the ultimate source; and this is the explanation given in the Valentinian fragment preserved by Epiphanius (Har. xxxi, 6). The use of the word Charis enabled Ptolemæus (quoted by Irenæus, i, 8) to find in John i, 14 the first tetrad of Æons, viz., Pater, Monogenes, Charis, Aletheia. Charis has an important place in the system of Marcus (Irenæus, i, 18). The name Charis appears also in the system of the Barbelites (Irenæus, i, 29), but as denoting a later emanation than in the Valentinian system. The word has possibly also a technical meaning in the Ophite prayers preserved by Origen (Contra Celsam, vi, 31).

Charisl (or Al Harisl), JEHUDA BEN-SOLOMON, the Horace of Jewish poets, was born at Jerez, in Spain, about 1170, and bore also the Arabic name, Al-khofri. He travelled over many parts of Europe, and into the East, and died about 1230, probably at Granada. He not only excelled as a poet, but also as a philosopher, physician, and translator. He translated from the Arabic into Hebrew Maimonides' commentary on the Seder Zeraim; the same author's introduction to the Mishna (Germ. transl. by R. Fürstenthal, Breslau, 1842), and his Guide or מורה נבוכים. His principal work is חזקוני or Diwan, which is not exactly an imitation or translation of Hariri's, though written in the style of the Arabian poet. The author describes human life in a multitude of its phases, relates his own adventures as a traveller, and takes a critical survey of Hebrew poetry. Portions of his work have been translated into Latin by Ure (London, 1772); into German by Kämpf and Dukes; into French by De Sacy. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 164 sq.; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. trans.), p. 75 sq.; Grätz, Gesch. der Juden, vi, 209 sq.; Braunschweiger, Gesch. der Juden in der Roman Staaten, p. 151; Jost, *Gesch. d. Charisia, in Greek mythology, were festivals in honor of the Charites or Graces, celebrated with dancing at night.

Charisius is the name of two early Christians:

1. Presbyter and oëconomus of the Church of Philadelphia, who presented himself at the sixth session of the Council of Ephesus, July 22, 431, and laid before the assembled prelates an accusation against two presbyters named Antonius and Jacobus, who had visited Lydia with commendatory letters from Anastasius and Photius, presbyters of Nestorius's party, and had induced the Lydians to sign a creed, of which Theodore of Mopsuestia was the author, excommunicating himself (Charisius) because he refused to accept it. Charisius laid the creed before the council, together with a list of those who had signed it, and their anathemas of their former errors. He also gave in a confession of his own faith, in perfect harmony with that of Nicæa. The council condemned the creed produced, as full of Nestorian impiety, carefully abstaining, however, from naming Theodore as its author. See Labbe, Concil. iii, 673-694; Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 417.

2. Bishop of Azotus, one of the subscribers to the Semi-arian Council of Seleucia (Epiphanius, Har. lxxiii, 874).

Charisterius. In the Valentinian fragment preserved by Epiphanius (Har. xxxi, 6), this name is given to one of five æons without consort, whose gra-eration took place at a late point in the series of emanations.

Charistia was a festival of relatives among the Romans, celebrated Feb. 19. The whole family was then assembled, past differences and discords were laid aside, and the bonds of love and unity were made firmer.

Charitana (or Charitina) was a Christian martyr in the Diocletian persecution, commemorated in the Menology of Basil, Oct. 5 and Jan. 15. By some she is identified with the Catharine of whom Eusebius speaks (viii, c. 14).

Charites. See GRACES.

Charitina and Charito were two early Christian martyrs. In the Acts of Justin Martyr we are told that they confessed Christ, and were scourged and beheaded.

Charito, a Greek monk, was raised to the patriarchate of Constantinople in 1177, under Manuel Comnenus, and occupied that see for eleven months. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charity, martyr. See CARITAS.

Charity, CHARTER of, the name given by pope Stephen to the constitutions which he drew up for the regulation and guidance of the Cistercian monks, when he united their monasteries into one body. See CISTERCIANS.

Charity (of Our Lady), NUNS HOSPITALLERS OF THE. See HOSPITALLERS.

Charke, WILLIAM, an English Puritan divine, was a fellow of Peterhouse College, Cambridge, in 1572, and was expelled. He published some theological treatises (1580, 1581). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Charles, ANTOINE, a French theologian and priest, was born in the parish of Puymaurin, diocese of Comminges, about 1630, and was educated at Toulouse. He became superior in the seminary of Pamiers, then adjunct of the ecclesiastical government of that diocese, and opposed the law which gave the kings of France the right to use the revenues of the vacant churches in certain cases. The parliament of Toulouse condemned the writings of Charles, but he escaped to Rome, where he died, April 7, 1698. His principal works are, Tractatus de Libertatibus Ecclesie Gallicane (Liege, 1684; Rome, 1720, 3 vols.);—Causa Regalis Penitus Explicata (Liege, 1685, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charles DE SAINT-BERNARD, a French Feuillant monk, who was born in 1597, and died March 14, 1621, founded the monastery of Fontaine. His Life was published under the assumed name of Tourneuse (Paris, 1622, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charles DE SAINT-PAUL, a French Church historian, died Sept. 15, 1644. His family name was Vialart. He became general of the Feuillants, and was appointed bishop of Avranches in 1640. He wrote, Geographia Sacra (Paris, 1641; Rome, 1666, 8vo; Amsterdam, 1703);—Mémoires du Cardinal de Richelieu (Paris, 1640, fol.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charles, Claude, an artist of Lorraine, was born at Nancy in 1661. He was rector of the academy of painting and sculpture of that city, and afterwards herald-at-arms and ordinary painter to duke Leopold. He worked nine years at Rome, under the direction of Carlo Maratti, and then, after residing for some time at Paris, came back to establish himself in his native city, where he died in 1747. Among his paintings are, The Crowning of St. Sigisbert and The Banquet of the Poor, both in the choir of the cathedral at Nancy; The Ascension of the Virgin, in the parish church of San Sebastiano; and St. Peter Delivered from Prison, in the church of Faulx. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charles, Claude Aimé, a French preacher, was born at Besançon in 1719. He entered the Jesuit order, and became remarkable for his oratory. He died in 1768, leaving some Orations, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charles, David, a Welsh Baptist minister, was born at Llanelly, Carmarthenshire, July 12, 1841. He began to preach about the beginning of 1860. Having spent two years in theological study, he became pastor, by ordination, in May, 1863, of the Church at Portmadoc, Carmarthenshire, and continued to labor with acceptance until within three weeks of his death, which took place in his native town, Sept. 14, 1869. He was an able preacher, a devout Christian, and his ministry was eminently successful. See (Lond.) Baptist Handbook, 1870, p. 190. (J. C. S.)

Charles, James, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was tutor in the family of Robert Wardlaw Ramsay; was licensed to preach in 1826; appointed assistant chaplain at Bengal, India, in 1832, and ordained; promoted to the chaplaincy in 1836; resigned in 1849, and was admitted to the living at Kirkcaldy the same year. He published two single Sermons. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, i, 154, 155.

Charles, John, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, of Laurencekirk, was educated at the parish school; took his degree at Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1792; became schoolmaster at Glenbervie; was presented by the king to the living at that place in 1821, and ordained. He died Nov. 17, 1868, aged ninety-eight years. He published a Sermon (1814);—The Protestant Hand-book (1855);—An Account of the Parish. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, iii, 872.

Charles, Thomas, a Welsh divine, was born in the parish of Llanvihangel, Carmarthenshire, in October, 1755. He was educated at Llandowrar, at Carmarthen Academy, and in 1775 entered Jesus College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1778, and began his ministry as curate in Somersetshire. He obtained the curacy of Llanymawddwy in 1784, and in 1785 began his great work of circulating the Bible, which he continued to the time of his death, in October, 1814. Mr. Charles was incessant in labor, and untiring in his faithfulness to the cause of Christ. See (Lond.) Christian Observer, Aug. 1875, append. p. 44; (Lond.) Christian Guardian, Dec. 1828, p. 491; The Life and Labors of Rev. T. Charles, by Rev. Edward Morgan (Lond. 1828).

Charleton, Elizabeth, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Wellington, Somersetshire, in 1793, and died in April, 1867. "Her offerings in the ministry were for the most part brief, and not frequent; but they were characterized with much weightiness of spirit, and earnest religious exercise." She had a truly catholic spirit, which enabled her to admire the virtues in other denominations. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1868, p. 28.

Charleton, Lewis, bishop of Hereford, who died in 1369, was distinguished for his theological and mathematical learning.

Charleton, Robert, an English minister of the Society of Friends, son of Elizabeth, was born at Bristol in 1809. He was carefully educated by religious parents, and spent several years of his early life with them in France. He was intimately connected with the missionary work, and especially with George Müller, in whose institution he took deep interest. In 1854 he was sent by the Yearly Meeting of the Society on a mission to the emperor of Russia, and in 1858 he went to Finland, Sweden, and Denmark on a similar mission. He died Dec. 5, 1873. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1874, p. 18.

Charlett, ARTHUR, D.D., an English divine, was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, became proctor of the university in 1683, master of University College in 1692, and died Nov. 4, 1722. He contributed a Letter on the Death of Anthony Wood, to the Philosophical Transactions (1708). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Le Neve, Fasts, iii, 495, 538.

Charlevoix, PIERRE FRANÇOIS XAVIER DE, a French Jesuit and traveller, was born at Saint-Quentin, Oct. 29, 1682. He embarked at La Rochelle in July, 1720, for the missions at Canada; arrived at Quebec towards the end of September; went up the St. Lawrence river; made an excursion to Illinois, and descended the Mississippi River as far as its mouth, with the intention of going thence to St. Domingo; but his vessel was wrecked at the entrance to the Bahama Channel. He reached St. Domingo on a second voyage, in 1722, and returned to France in December of the same year. Having been selected to work upon the Journal de Trévoux, he accomplished his task in twenty-two years, with great success, and died at La Flèche, Feb. 11, 1761, leaving, Histoire et Description du Japon (Rouen, 1715, 3 vols.) :—Histoire de l'île de St. Dominique (Paris, 1730, 2 vols. 4to) :—Histoire de la Nouvelle France (ibid. 1744, 4 vols. 4to) :—Histoire de Paraguay (ibid. 1756, 3 vols. 4to) :—La Vie de la Mère Marie de l'Incarnation (ibid. 1724). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charlier, GILES (Lat. Ægidius Carlerius), a Belgian theologian, was born at Cambray, studied at Paris, was professor of theology in the College of Navarre, and from 1431 to 1472 dean of the Church of Cambray. In 1433 he attended the Council of Basle, and was commissioned by the synod to proceed to Prague, and endeavor to bring the Bohemians to the council (see Labbe, Concil. xii, p. 1159-1248; in Canisius, Ant. Lect. iii). On his return to France, Charlier was elected dean of the faculty of theology at Paris, where he died, Nov. 23, 1473, leaving Scripte Fragmentorum (Brussels, 1478, 1479, 2 vols.), and several other unedited works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, append. p. 193; Hefele, Concilien Geschichte, vii, 494, 514 sq.; Jungmann, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Charlton, Frederick, a Baptist minister, was born in Connecticut in 1822, and united with the Church in 1840. Having pursued a course of study at Madison University, he was pastor in Webster, Mass., three years, and in Wilmington, Del., five years. For two years he was in the service of the American Baptist Publication Society. He went to California in 1860, and was pastor of the Church in Sacramento till his death, Aug. 9, 1871. Under his ministrations this Church grew to be one of the largest and most influential in the state. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 205. (J. C. S.)

Charlton, George W., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Williamsburg, Va., Sept. 26, 1796. He experienced religion at the age of nineteen, entered the Virginia Conference in 1818, located in 1828, and in 1840 removed to Petersburg, where he resided to the close of his life, in February, 1863. Mr. Charlton was endowed with extraordinary abilities as a pulpit orator; was well read, cultured, bold and scathing in satire, startling and terrible in philippics, a sincere Christian, and a successful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1863, p. 439.

Charlton, John Moon, A.M., an English Congregational minister, was born at Kendal, March 25, 1817. He was converted in his youth, received his ministerial training at Highbury College, and began his ministry in 1842, at Totteridge, Herts. After twelve years of earnest and happy labor there, during which he had made himself thoroughly acquainted with the standard philosophical works of the day, and become well versed in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, he filled the pulpit of Mas-borough, Yorkshire, a short time, and then was invited to the theological professorship of Western College, at Plymouth, where he died, Dec. 12, 1875. See (London) Cong. Year-book, 1877, p. 350.

Charlton, Robert, a missionary of the Church of England, officiated as catechist, first at New Windsor, N. Y., and afterwards in New York city. In the latter place he was the successor of Rev. Thomas Colgan, who had been assistant to the Rev. William Vesey, rector of Trinity Church. His service in New York city extended from 1732 to 1740. In 1749 he became pastor of St. Andrew's Church on Staten Island, N. Y. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 16.

Charlton, Thomas (1), an English Independent, who is said to have been educated at the Academy under Dr. Ridgley, London, was one of the subscribing ministers at the Salter's-Hall Synod in 1719. In 1717 his name appears as minister of the church in Aldermansbury. He was a good man, but not popular. He died at Thatcham, Berks, May 1, 1755. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, ii, 529, 530.

Charlton, Thomas (2), an English Baptist, was brought up a Methodist, and was a popular preacher among that people; but, adopting Baptist views, he was baptized about 1772, having been already minister at Snow's-Fields, Southwark, since 1767, and remained there till his death, Dec. 19, 1774, aged thirty-four years. He is said to have been the means of awakening the father of the Rev. A. M. Toplady. He published a Funeral Sermon on Mr. Hughes, by whom he was baptized. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 283, 284.

Charmaig, commemorated March 16 (cir. A.D. 640). In the west of Scotland a saint of this name is found in the church dedications. He is identified with St. Abon Mac Ua-Corbmaic, of Magh-Ar-naidhe in Ui-Coinn-seaigh, in Leinster, who is mentioned in St. Engus's Litany. See Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 77; Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, p. 299 sq.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Charmosynus was a presbyter, sent, with the presbyter Theognostus and the deacon Leontius, by Cyril of Alexandria to Constantinople, A.D. 433, on the subject of establishing peace with the Oriental churches. He was present also at the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, as a presbyter and oecumenus of the Alexandrian Church, with Euthalius, an archdeacon, and other Alexandrian churchmen. To them was delivered the sentence against Dioscorus (Cyril, Alex. Epist. xxxvii, 2 xi; Patrol. Græc. lxxvii, 167; Ceillier, viii, 295).—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Charon, in Greek and Roman mythology, was the ferryman across the river of death. This representation originated in Egypt, where all the dead who were worthy of an honorable burial were piloted in a small boat to the islands of the blessed, i. e. to the general place of burial. According to the myths of Greece, Charon, an old servant of Pluto, was placed as a guard on the river of Hades, and took the souls that Mercury brought to him in a boat across the Styx or Acheron, for which an obolus had to be paid, and this coin was laid under the tongue of the dead. Those of the dead who had not received a burial were obliged to wander along the bank of the Styx for one hundred years. Charon was not allowed to ferry the living across, unless specially authorized so to do by the immortals. For rowing Hercules across without requiring him to show the golden bough, which was the sign of deity, he was deprived of his liberty for one year. Homer does not speak of this myth. A representation of this, from an antique bass-relief, is shown on following page. Two forms step from Charon's boat; the Parca reaches out her hand to the first. Her full spindle shows the early death of this shade. The second shade is of the size of a child. To the right is Lethe, with the draught of forgetfulness.

Charon.

Charpentier, Hubert, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Coulommiers, in the diocese of Meaux, in 1565. He founded the pilgrim shrine of Notre Dame de Garaison, at the foot of the Pyrenees; that of the missionaries of Notre Dame de Betharram, at the foot of a mountain called Calvary, in the bishopric of Lescar; and the congregation of the priests of Calvary, on Mount Valérien, near Paris. Charpentier became the friend of the abbé de St. Cyran, and had relations with the recluses of Port Royal. He died at Paris, Dec. 10, 1650. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charpentier, Pierre François (called Pierre Étienne and François Philippe), a French engraver in aquatinta, was born at Blois in 1739. Some of his principal plates are, The Education of the Virgin; The Descent from the Cross. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Charpentier, René, a French sculptor, was born at Paris in 1680, studied under Girardon, and executed a number of works in the Church of St. Roch. He died at Paris, May 15, 1723. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charpy, Gaétan, a French monk, was born at Macon in 1683. He was of the congregation of the Theatines, of which he became the superior at Paris. He wrote, Vie du B. Gaétan de Thienne (Paris, 1657, 4to): — Elogium Cardinalis Mazurini Apologeticum, etc. (ibid. 1658, 8vo): — Histoire de l'Éthiopie Orientale, translated from the Portuguese of De Santo (ibid. 1684, 12mo): — Relation de la Mission Faite en France par les Théatins en 1644 (MS.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charpy, Nicolas (surnamed Sainte-Croix), a French adventurer and visionary, was born at Sainte-Croix (Bresse), and died about 1670. Mézerai says that he had been secretary of M. de Cinq-Mars some time before the latter was arrested at Narbonne. Charpy lay hid for a month, and then escaped to Savigny. Afterwards he returned to France, and fell into a religious frenzy, in which he pretended to utter prophecies. Charpy published Le Héraut de la Fin des Temps (Paris, 1657, 8vo), in which he advances absurd chiliastic notions concerning the speedy coming of Christ and the end of the world, similar to the frequent delusions on that exciting subject. It was refuted by Arnauld, in Remarques, etc., published at Paris (1665, 8vo [very rare], and 1735, 12mo). There is also under the name of Sainte-Croix Charpy, Cathéchisme Eucharistique en deux Journées (Paris, 1668, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charrier (de la Roche), Louis, a French prelate, was born at Lyons, May 17, 1738. He was made doctor, March 17, 1764, and not long after was appointed vicar-general of Lyons, and vice-general of the commons. He attached himself to the Jansenist party, and thus fell into controversy on politico-religious questions. In 1791 he took the oath of the civil constitution of the clergy, and was appointed as constitutional bishop of the department of Seine-Inférieure. He continued, however, his inflammatory course, and, on Oct.

26, 1791, resigned his office, left France, and wrote to several of his fellows to follow his example. Some time afterwards Charrier returned to France, and published an Examen of the decree of Aug. 27, 1791, on marriage. He at length became reconciled with the pope, and ceased his political agitation. Being appointed bishop of Versailles, and at length first chancellor of Bonaparte in 1802, Mgr. Charrier assisted at the Council of Paris in 1811. He died March 17, 1827. Among his publications are, Refutation de l'Instruction Pastorale de l'Evêque de Boulogne sur l'Autorité Spirituelle (1791, 8vo): — Questions sur les Affaires Présentes de l'Eglise de France (1792, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charron, Pierre, a French writer, was born at Paris in 1541. At first he studied law at Orleans and Bourges, and practiced several years in his profession, but afterwards betook himself to the study of theology, and soon became a famous pulpit orator. He preached several years in the south of France, and became chaplain to queen Marguerite. When forty-seven years old he returned to Paris, with the intention of joining a monastic order. Being refused, on account of his advanced age, he went again to the south. At Bordeaux he became acquainted with Montaigne, who exercised a great influence upon him. In 1594 he published his Des Trois Vérités (Bordeaux), and the bishop of Cahors appointed him vicar-general. The year following he represented his diocese at the meeting of the French clergy, and was elected its clerk. He died suddenly at Paris, Nov. 16, 1603. Of his many writings, besides the above, we mention a collection of sixteen Discours Chrétiens (ibid. 1600): — Traité de la Sagesse (ibid. 1601 a. o.). The principles laid down in this last work found some severe opponents, especially in the Jesuit Garasse, who accused Charron of atheism. In the second edition, which appeared in 1604, some of the obnoxious passages were left out; but in 1607 a new edition of the correct text was published, which became the basis for later editions as published by Elzevir in 1646 and Didot in 1789. The best and most complete edition is the one published by Renouard (Dijon, 1801, 4 vols.). See Schmidt, in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. s. v.; Bayle, Dictionnaire Historique et Critique, s. v.; Brucker, Historia Philosophia, iv, 512; Arboux, in Lichtenberger's Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Charroux, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Carrofense). Two provincial synods were held here:

I. About 989, by six bishops. Three canons were published.

1. Excommunicates those who break into churches, or carry away anything out of them. 2. Those who rob the poor. 3. Those who lay violent hands upon the clergy.

See Labbe, Concil. ix, 733.

II. In 1028, against the Manichæans, by William, duke of Aquitaine. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 860.

Charrubiun are angels, among the Mohammedans, esteemed to be the rulers of the other spirits. The name seems related to the Hebrew Cherubim, as also the signification.

Chart, in Slavonic mythology, is the devil, whom several Wendian tribes worshipped, in common with all Slavonic tribes, who revered the evil spirit, Czernobog. Chart probably is derived from Charni (black). He is therefore, like Czernobog, the black evil deity.

Charthenius, Saint, is supposed to have been bishop of Marseilles. He took part with Avitus, bishop of Vienne, at a conference of Catholic and Arian bishops, held at Lyons about 499, when king Gundobald was present (Avit. Vien. Epist. xxviii).

Charteris (or Charters), Charles, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1697; was licensed to preach in 1701; appointed to the living at Arbirlot in 1702, and ordained. He was deposed by the presbytery in August, 1728, but the sentence was reversed by the assembly in 1729. He died in December, the same year, aged about fifty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 789.

Charteris, Henry, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, was principal of Edinburgh University; admitted to the living at North Leith in April, 1620; and promoted to the professorship of divinity in Edinburgh University in May, 1627. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 93.

Charteris, John, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of the professor of divinity at Edinburgh, took his degree at that university in 1624; was elected and presented to the living at Currie in 1631, and died Feb. 14, 1668, aged about sixty-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 145.

Charteris, Lawrence, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, fourth son of the professor of divinity at Edinburgh, took his degree there in 1646; was called to the living at Bathans in 1653, and his examination being satisfactory, he was ordained in 1654. Conforming to episcopacy, he was collated in 1662. In 1670 he was one of those who were styled "bishop's evangelists," sent to preach to the Presbyterian Whigs of the West. In 1671 he was offered a bishopric, but declined it, and was promoted to the professorship of divinity in 1675, previously occupied by his father. He died at Edinburgh, Dec. 1700, in the 75th year of his age, leaving several small publications. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 327, 363.

Charteris, Thomas (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, son of the divinity professor at Edinburgh, took his degree at that university in 1635; preached for several years as a supply at Humberie; was ordained helper and colleague at that living in 1646, and died before Oct. 27, 1647, aged thirty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 337.

Charteris, Thomas (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1646; was minister at Stonehouse in 1650; joined the protesting party in 1651, and was transferred to Kilbride before 1654. He died June, 1656, aged about thirty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 290, 303.

Charterius, the ninth bishop of Périgueux, in the latter half of the 6th century, was brought before king Chilperic I in 582, charged with dictating letters derogatory to the king, but was by him forgiven. In 585 Charterius was present at the second synod of Macon.

Charters (or Charteris), Samuel (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1690; was called to the living at Inverkeithing in 1692, and ordained. He died June 28, 1733, aged about sixty-four years, leaving his son Thomas his successor. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 593.

Charters, Samuel (2), D.D., a Scotch clergyman, grandson of the foregoing, was educated at a grammar-school, and at the Glasgow University, where he gave indications of a superior mind and powerful understanding. He was licensed to preach in 1764; resided for a time at Amsterdam; was presented by the king to the living at Kincardine in 1768, and ordained in 1769. In saying the Confession of Faith, he added "except chap. x, art. 4." He was transferred to Wilton in 1772, and died June 18, 1825, aged eighty-three years. He was a man of quiet life and retired habits, and preferred living on the banks of the Teviot to the attractions of Glasgow, when a valuable preferment was offered to him there in 1784. He was slow, grave, and solemn in manner, but delightfully instructive and warm-hearted. He published a Sermon for the S. P. C. K. (1779):—An Instruction Concerning Oaths (1782), which was printed by the sheriff at the expense of the county, and read from the pulpits:—several single Sermons:—Sermons (1786, 2 vols.):—Sermons on Retirement:—Sermons on the Lord's Supper:—An Essay on Bashfulness. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 517; ii, 727.

Charters, Thomas, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1730; called to the living at Inverkeithing in 1731 as assistant to his father, and ordained. He died Feb. 13, 1744, in his fortieth year. His son Samuel was minister at Wilton. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 593.

Chartier, GUILLAUME, a French prelate, was born at Bayeux about 1400. Like his brother Alain, and probably upon the recommendation of the latter, he became a scholar of the University of Paris. After having acquired the degree of licentiate of civil and common law, he sought reputation as a poet. In 1432 he was appointed professor of canonical jurisprudence in the newly erected University of Poitiers, by Charles VII. Soon afterwards he became pastor of St. Lambert, near Saumur, and canon of Tournay. Next he was called as canon of the cathedral in 1436, counsellor of the Parliament of Paris, chancellor of Notre Dame, and finally bishop of that see, Sept. 4, 1447. He interceded with the archbishop of Rheims to settle the quarrel between the mendicants and the university. In 1455 he was one of the papal commissioners to effect the rehabilitation of Joan of Arc. In 1459 he took part in the Convention of Mantua, which was called by Pius II against the Turks. He was at first in favor with Louis XI, but afterwards fell under the displeasure of that prince. He died in Paris, May 1, 1472. See Horæler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, a. v.

Chartres, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Carnotense), was a provincial synod held on the third Sunday after Easter, 1146, at which all the French bishops were present, together with the king, Louis VII. The object was to arrange matters relating to the crusade, and to persuade St. Bernard to accept the office of leader, which, however, he constantly refused. See Labbe, Concil. x, 1102.

Chartres, RENAUD (Lat. Reginaldus) DE, a French prelate and politician, was born about 1380. After having obtained the university degree of a licentiate of law, he first became canon, then deacon of St. Pierre de Beauvais in 1406. In September, 1404, he was condemned, with his brother Pierre de Chartres, "for some insult against the bailliff of the bishop of Beauvais." Some time afterwards pope John XXIII made him his private referendary, and the chapter of Beauvais elected him their bishop. He did not take possession of that see, however, but was elevated in January, 1414, to the archbishopric of Rheims. In 1415 he went to the Council of Constance, and received in the same year, at Beauvais, the emperor Sigismund on his coming to France. After being president of the chamber of the counts before 1415, and member of the privy council, he was appointed, Aug. 15, 1418, lieutenant of the king in Dauphiny, Languedoc, and the districts adjoining Lyons and Macon. He was next appointed (March 24, 1424) chancellor of France, but a few months after he resigned in favor of Martin Gouge, his predecessor. In 1425 Charles VII sent him as "orateur d'obedience" to pope Martin V. On Nov. 8, 1428, Renaud received a second time the seals of France as chancellor. When Joan of Arc offered her services to Charles VII, Renaud recommended her examination by a special court. He was present during the remarkable siege of Orleans in 1429, and was largely concerned in the stirring events of that period, in all of which he showed himself a shrewd, but equivocal and unscrupulous, diplomat. He received many other ecclesiastical favors, including the cardinalate (Dec. 29, 1439), and died April 4, 1444. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Charybdis, in Greek mythology, was the daughter of Neptune and the Earth. The myth makes her residence the Sicilian strait. There is a dangerous eddy there, perhaps more formidable to the light-built ships of the ancients than it appears to us. Charybdis is represented as a rapacious woman, who robbed Hercules of his herds, and was therefore hurled into the sea by Jupiter's lightnings, still retaining her old nature. She lived in a rock under an overhanging fig-tree, and threatened all passers-by with death and destruction. In order to still her hunger she devoured whole ships, with all in them. Three times every day she would swallow the sea-water and throw it out again with a loud noise, drowning everything that came within reach. On the opposite shore Scylla also destroyed the ships of mariners. Hence the Latin proverb, "Incidit in Scyllam cupiens vitare Charybdis."

Chasse, in Slavonic mythology, was a Wendian deity, principally worshipped in Bohemia.

Chasan, Abraham BEN-JEHUDA, a Jewish writer of the 16th century, is the author of מְבִינֵי, or A Commentary on the Prophets, Hagiographa and Five Megilloth (Lublin, 1593, 1612). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 167; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 78 sq. (B. P.)

Chasan, Chajim, a learned Jew of Smyrna, who died in 1712 in Poland, while collecting funds in aid of the resident Jews in Palestine, is the author of פְּנֵי הַתּוֹרָה, or Discussions on the Pentateuch (Venice, 1698). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 167. (B. P.)

Chase, Albert H., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Killingly, Conn., June 4, 1823, of English parentage. In early life he united with the Church in East Killingly, and took an active part in religious affairs. In 1853 he began a course of theological study at New Hampton Institute, N. H.; in November, 1855, removed to Cherry Valley, O., and was pastor there for two years. In November, 1857, he became pastor of the Church in New Lyme, and remained there ten years. From 1864 to 1867 a large part of his time was spent in organizing and collecting funds for the Freedmen's Mission Work, also in raising funds for the erection of a church in Chicago, Ill. Early in January, 1867, he was appointed publishing agent and business manager of the Christian Freeman, a denominational paper, established in Chicago. In December, 1868, he became pastor in Cleveland, O., and in 1869 and 1870 was pastor at Harrisburg, Pa. He was corresponding secretary of the Free-will Baptist Home Mission Society for several years, having his residence in Hillsdale, Mich. The remainder of his life was spent in ministerial labor, without settlement, among feeble and pastorless churches. He died June 19, 1883. See Morning Star, July 25, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Chase, Amos, a Congregational minister, graduated from Dartmouth College in 1780; was ordained pastor of the Second Church in Litchfield, Conn., June 27, 1787; was dismissed in 1814, and died in 1849. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 592.

Chase, Benjamin A., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born about 1834. He was converted in 1853, while a student at Newbury, Vt., and in 1858 entered the itinerant ranks. He filled important appointments in the East Maine Conference, spent three years in the army, united with the Providence Conference in 1870, and labored zealously until his death at East Cumberland, R. I., Aug. 17, 1875. Mr. Chase was systematic, resolute, and devout. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 58.

Chase, Benjamin Chapman, a Congregational minister, was born at Cornish, N. H., Jan. 29, 1819, and was converted at nine years of age. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1846, and from Bangor Theological Seminary in 1849. He was ordained pastor in Camden, Me., Jan. 8, 1850; installed in Attleboro', Mass., in July, 1857, and after a pastorate of six years, supplied the Church in Oldtown, Me., for fifteen months, after which he became stated supply in Foxcroft and Dover, and on May 8, 1866, was installed at Foxcroft, where he died, Oct. 13, 1868. See Cong. Quarterly, 1869, p. 290.

Chase, Carlton, D.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Hopkinton, N. H., Feb. 20, 1794. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1817; was ordained deacon in 1818, priest in 1820; was consecrated in Christ Church, Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 20, 1844, as bishop of New Hampshire, and died at his episcopal residence in Claremont, Jan. 18, 1870. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1871, p. 118.

Chase, Daniel, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Stratham, N. H., Nov. 7, 1770. He professed faith in Christ when about twenty years of age; soon after was licensed to preach by Rev. Benjamin Randall, and a few years later was ordained. He removed to Vermont, and in 1816 to Pennsylvania, where he itinerated, and preached in Susquehanna, Broome, and Wayne counties, accomplishing much good. He died at Mount Pleasant, Wayne Co., Pa., March 2, 1850. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1851, p. 79. (J. C. S.)

Chase, Daniel S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, son of the noted Rev. Abner Chase, was born in 1814. He was converted at the age of nine, and at twenty-six entered the Genesee Conference, wherein he labored until the formation of the East Genesee Conference, when he became one of its active members. In 1872 he was transferred to the Central New York Conference, in which he served until his death, Feb. 1, 1879. Mr. Chase's sermons were models of careful preparation and thought. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 61.

Chase, Ebenezer, a Congregational minister, was born at Bedford, N. H., in 1785. Early in life he united with the Free-will Baptist Church, and in 1810 was ordained an evangelist in that denomination. He published and edited for some years The Religious Informer, which was largely circulated among the Free-will Baptists. In 1828 he united with the Congregational body. He served successively at Gilsam, N. H., Westmoreland, Vt., West Tisbury, Mass., West Yarmouth, and Eastham, and died at West Tisbury, May 22, 1866. Mr. Chase preached many thousand sermons, and many revivals blessed his ministry. See Cong. Quarterly, 1866, p. 392.

Chase, Edward R., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Flint, Mich., Sept. 20, 1840. He served during the Civil War in the 8th Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry; after its close he studied theology at the Union Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill.; was licensed and, in 1871, ordained pastor in Clyde, O., where he died, May 25, 1874. See Whitney Family of Connecticut, ii, 1202. (J. C. S.)

Chase, Edwin Bailey, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was ordained deacon in 1857, and entered the active ministry in 1858, as a missionary, at Belvidere, N. J. In 1860 he was chosen rector of St. Michael's Church, Marblehead, Mass.; in 1865 removed to Mansfield, Pa.; in 1866 became rector of St. Peter's Church, Cambridgeport, Mass.; in 1874 left the active ministry, and died May 6, 1875. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

Chase, E. B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Dixmont, Me., April 3, 1806. He removed with his parents to Ohio in 1819; was converted at sixteen; soon afterwards became an exhorter and local preacher; and in 1830 entered the Ohio Conference. In its active ranks he labored until his death, March 4, 1852. Mr. Chase was a plain, practical, and useful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1852, p. 151.

Chase, Hiram, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Charleston, Montgomery Co., N. Y., Feb. 1, 1801. He received a careful religious training, experienced conversion at the age of twenty, was licensed to exhort in 1823, and in 1827 received license to preach, and entered the New York Conference. On the organization of the Troy Conference, in 1832, Mr. Chase became one of its members, and in it served until 1864, when he became superannuated, and retired to Sandy Hill. He was afterwards effective and supernumerary as his health permitted, until his death at Los Angeles, Cal., Jan. 9, 1877. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 66.

Chase, Irah, D.D., an eminent Baptist minister and biblical scholar, was born at Stratton, Vt., Oct. 5, 1793. He was fitted for college under the direction of Rev. Dr. Sanders, the first president of the University of Vermont, graduated from Middlebury College, Vt., in 1814, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1817. He was ordained as an evangelist at Danvers, Mass., in September of the same year, and for some time preached as a missionary in Western Virginia. His attention was early turned to the urgent necessity of starting a seminary of sacred learning to meet the wants of the rising ministry of the Baptist denomination. For seven years (1818-25) he was connected with the theological department of Columbian College, Washington, D. C., during one of which he was in Europe, devoting himself to the studies of his profession, and performing some needed work in the interests of his denomination. Having resigned his position at Washington, he went to Massachusetts and opened a school for theological students at Newton, Nov. 28, 1825, which resulted in the well-known Baptist seminary there. He was a hard and most diligent student, patiently plodding to get at anything he wished to reach, cost what it might of time and toil. After twenty years' service he resigned his office, and spent the remainder of his life in Boston and Newton, largely occupied with literary work, chiefly in the line of his lifelong studies. He died at Newton Centre, Nov. 1, 1864. Dr. Chase wrote and published a large amount of matter in Baptist publications, and in the Bibliotheca Sacra, some of his papers embodying the results of patient and protracted investigation. In addition to these were the following volumes: Life of Bunyan;—The Design of Baptism, Viewed in its Relation to Christian Life;—The Apostolic Constitutions;—Infant Baptism an Invention of Men, etc. (J. C. S.)

Chase, James Morris, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Cornish, N. H., April 4, 1800. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1827. In 1832 he was licensed by the Schuyler Presbytery, and in 1837 was ordained pastor of Shiloh Church at Macomb, Ill. In 1846 he preached as stated supply at Camp Creek, in 1853 at Mount Sterling, and in 1854 became pastor at Ebenezer, where he died, Feb. 10, 1865. He was a ripe scholar, an able preacher, and a highly respected pastor. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 97.

Chase, John, a Baptist minister, was born at Cornwallis, N. S., in 1804. He was converted in 1808; ordained at Billtown, July 1, 1835; was pastor at Bridge-town eleven years; for a time Financial Agent of the Nova Scotia Baptist Educational Society, and died at Wolfville, Nov. 13, 1879. See Baptist Year-book for Maritime Provinces of Canada, 1880; Bill, Fifty Years with the Baptists, p. 569.

Chase, Mary, a minister of the Society of Friends, and wife of Abijah Chase, was reared in the Protestant Episcopal Church, but abandoned it at the age of nineteen to join the Quakers, and soon after became a preacher among them. Her favorite theme was the fulness and freeness of salvation. She died at Salem, Mass., April 26, 1861, aged eighty-seven years. For several years previous she had been an invalid. See Amer. Annual Monitor, 1862, p. 20.

Chase, Moses, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Newton, N. H., in 1803. He experienced religion at twenty-three, and in 1833 united with the New Hampshire Conference, in which he served until his sudden death, Jan. 7, 1866. Mr. Chase possessed more than ordinary ministerial ability. About five thousand were added to the Church through his instrumentality, thirty of whom became ministers. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 51.

Chase, Nathaniel, a Baptist minister, was born at Buckfield, Me., about 1770, and was among the original Baptists of the place. In 1796, soon after the formation of a Church in the town, he was licensed, and in 1801 was called to the pastorate of the Church, which prospered under his ministry for thirty-four years. On account of age he then resigned and removed to Hebron, where he preached occasionally, and died about 1850. See Millett, Hist. of the Baptists of Maine, p. 439. (J. C. S.)

Chase, Nathaniel L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Unity, N. H., Oct. 30, 1813. He was converted in 1826, and in 1842 was licensed to preach, and admitted into the New Hampshire Conference. His last years were spent as a superannuate. He died May 3, 1875. Mr. Chase was a man of deep and uniform piety, a close student, an instructive and edifying minister, and a laborious pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 79.

Chase, Oscar F., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1825. He was converted in 1856; in 1860 was admitted into the Michigan Conference, and therein labored until his death, Oct. 17, 1863. Mr. Chase was a studious, faithful, and able minister, retiring in his social life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 228.

Chase, Plummer, a Congregational minister, was born at Newbury, Mass., in 1794. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1821, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1824, and was ordained at Machias, Me., March 1, 1825. He preached at Carver, Mass., from 1828 to 1835, and died at Newbury, Sept. 17, 1837. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 57.

Chase, Robert F., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, became rector, in 1857, in Amesbury, Mass.; the following year in Danvers, of Calvary Church, a position which he continued to hold until 1865, when he was made assistant rector of St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia, Pa., and this position he retained until 1868, when he became rector of St. Matthias's Church, in the same city. In 1870 he resided there without charge, but in the following year was rector of the Memorial Mission of St. Peter's Church. He died Aug. 3, 1872. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 33.

Chase, Robert G., a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Hopkinton, N. H., Dec. 19, 1835. He graduated from Burlington College in 1856, and was ordained deacon the same year. His first curacy was at Pemberton, N. J.; and in 1859 he accepted the rectorship of St. Matthias's Church, Philadelphia, where he labored with great zeal and success, until his death, by drowning, July 24, 1867, off Mt. Desert, on the coast of Maine. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. Oct. 1867, p. 500.

Chase, Samuel, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Quincy, Ill., was for many years president of Jubilee College, Robin's Nest, and rector of Christ Church, in the same place. He died there, Jan. 15, 1878, aged sixty-nine years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 168.

Chase, Thomas, an English martyr, was of Amersham, and was cruelly persecuted for the Gospel and word of Christ. He was taken before the blind bishop of Woburn, in Buckinghamshire, examined, and commanded to be put in what was called "Little Ease," in the bishop's house. Here he lay bound most painfully with chains, gyves, manacles, and irons, often almost perishing with hunger. All this he took most quietly and patiently. He was hanged in the Lollard's Tower in 1514. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv. 124.

Chase, William Henry, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in the state of New York in 1805, and was connected with the Scipio Quarterly Meeting. For many years he "was among the foremost in advancing the cause of religion, peace, temperance, and education," by the tongue and the pen. His most valuable work was, Day by Day, being a compilation from the writings of ancient and modern Friends. He died suddenly at Union Springs, Cayuga Co., N. Y., July 7, 1877. See Friends Review, xxxi, 73. (J. C. S.)

Chase, William Plummer, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Canterbury, N. H., May 31, 1812. He was baptized in 1829, began to preach in 1831, and was ordained at Canterbury in October, 1834. For five years he toiled as an evangelist in northern New York, amid poverty and hardships, and saw many revivals. He next labored at East Weare, N. H., and, as the result of a powerful revival, organized a Church. In 1841 he removed to Limerick, Me. Overwork and application to study broke down his health, and in 1843 he returned to New Hampshire. For many years he supplied different churches, as his strength permitted, until his death in South Vineland, N. J., Feb. 5, 1874. See Morning Star, March 18, 1874. (J. C. S.)

Chaska, in the mythology of the Peruvians, was the god of the morning star. He had a separate temple in the wall surrounding the great sun-temple, where all kinds of offerings were brought to him. The name is significant of the long hairs (symbol of rays) of gold, with which he was represented. As companion of the sun he was also called its page.

Chassagnion (Chassaignon, Chassanion, Chassinon, or Lachasse), JEAN DE, a French savant of the 16th century, was a native of Monistrol (Velay), and one of the main propagators of the Reformation in France. He organized in 1556 a Church at Meaux, but was compelled to leave it, and continued his work at Montpellier; afterwards he took refuge in Geneva and at Metz in 1576. He is the author of Histoire Mémorable des Grands et Merveilleux Jugemens et Punitions de Dieu (Geneva, 1595);—Histoire des Albigeois, etc. (ibid. eod.). See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 733; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Chassan. See CHAZZAN.

Chasse (Cupsa). (1) A coffer for holding the relics of a saint. It formerly had the shape of a long bottle, with a little roof-like covering. It was made of copper, gilt, and sometimes enamelled. From the 13th century it took the shape of a little church. (2) An embroidered case or covering for the book of the Gospels; sometimes called the camisia. See RELIQUARY.

Chassel, REMI FRANÇOIS, a French artist, was born at Metz, in Lorraine, in 1666, and received instruction from Lecomte. He was appointed professor of sculpture in the academy at Nancy, and executed a large number of figures, among which are The Dead Christ, in the Church des Carmes, at Nancy; also one of Charity. He died Oct. 5, 1752. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Chassels, DAVID, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Glasgow, Scotland, April 30, 1787. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1810, and then took charge of the Caledonia County Academy, Peacham, Vt. In 1815 he went to Cambridge, Washington Co., N. Y., as principal of the academy there. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Troy in 1819, and ordained in 1820. In 1821 he taught at Fairfield, in 1840 became principal of the academy in Herkimer, and in 1842-44 again taught in Fairfield Academy. During all this time, after his licensure, he was in the habit of preaching often, as stated supply, and for five years regularly filled the pulpits at Fairfield and Salisbury. He died at Holland Patent, Jan. 10, 1870. He had the gift of teaching in a pre-eminent degree; his scholarship was thorough and profound; his preaching was like his teaching, instructive, thoughtful, intellectual, soundly Calvinistic. See Presbyterianism in Central N. Y. p. 494.

Chastain, Lewis, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was admitted into the itinerant ranks in 1787, and appointed assistant at Bertie, N. C.; in 1788, at Alleghany; in 1789, at Gloucester, Va.; and in 1790 and 1791 at Berkeley. In 1792 he located, and nothing more is recorded concerning him. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1787-92; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 205.

Chastain, Rane, a Baptist minister, was born in Powhatan County, Va., June 28, 1741, of French extraction. When quite young he removed to Buckingham County, where he remained during the rest of his life. When he was about thirty years of age he became a Christian, and soon after began to preach. He was chosen pastor of the Buckingham Church in April, 1772, and continued in office for fifty-three years. He also, at different times, supplied other churches, as his strength would permit. Although not an accomplished preacher, he was an excellent pastor, and greatly beloved by the churches to whom he ministered. He supported himself chiefly by his own labor on a farm. See Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, p. 190-192. (J. C. S.)

Chaste Brethren and Sisters is a name adopted by the Apostolici (q. v.) of the 12th century, in consequence of their preference of celibacy to marriage.

Chaste Week is an old English term for the period immediately following Ash-Wednesday; so called because the faithful, having just received absolution on Shrove-Tuesday, were expected to remain pure at the commencement of Lent.

Chasteau. See CHATEAU.

Chastillon (or Châtillon), LOUIS DE, a French engraver and painter in miniature and enamel, was born at Sainte-Menehould, in Champagne, in 1639, and died in 1784. The following are his principal plates: The Adulteress Before Christ; The Conversion of St. Paul; The Seven Sacraments; St. John on the Isle of Patmos. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Chastity was a virtue deified by the Romans, and represented on the reverse of a medal of Faustina the younger, sitting, and dressed in the habit of a Roman matron, holding a sceptre in her hand, with two doves at her feet. Juvenal sarcastically says she was once upon our earth in the reign of Saturn, but that she quitted it about the time Jupiter began to have a beard.

Chasuble (Chesible, or Chesuble). We give additional particulars respecting this important clerical garment:

nable was not restricted to the ministry of the altar. There is another form of this vestment, too, almost circular, which appears to be the oldest in existence, figured in the mosaic of St. Vitalli's Church, at Ravenna, the date of which is A.D. 547. In England its shape continued to be nearly circular for about six centuries after the mission of Augustine (Fig. 2). A chasuble discovered about thirty years ago in a walled-up ambry at Waterford, in Ireland, is also of this form. When a change was made, the only alteration seems to have been that two opposite parts of the circumference were made to come to a point. This form was in use for many ages, and is that frequently represented on memorial brasses; but, for about three hundred years before the Reformation, the chasuble was likewise made in the shape of a vestica piscis, and the ornaments with which it was then decorated became far more elaborate, and consequently richer and more beautiful. This shape must likewise be very old, for it is figured on the recently discovered frescos at St. Clement's, Rome, where the wearer, with outstretched arms, is giving the pax. Another shape, differing from those depicted in the other illustrations, is that of the ancient and precious vestment of St. Thomas of Canterbury, still preserved at the cathedral of Sens (Fig. 3). It has the Y-cross both before and behind. The aperture for the head is almost square, and the sides are unusually long and deep. The chasuble of St. Bouiface, apostle of Germany, preserved at Mayence, is also very like that of St. Thomas. The chasuble was usually made of silk, satin, velvet, or damask, though sometimes of inferior materials.

"It is now necessary to describe the Orphrey (aurifrigium) and the 'Flower,' as it was called, of the chasuble, which, in the Middle Ages, were so elaborately decorated by embroiderers. The former was a band, which ran up behind and before through the middle. Properly speaking, there was no cross upon the old English chasuble, but at the breast sprang out (from the pectores, or pillars), in the shape of the forked part of a large Y, two other bands (called numerals), which went over the shoulders, until in the same form from behind they met (in the dorsal) (Fig. 4). In more modern times this Y-shaped figure has been transformed into a cross, while sometimes a crucifix is embroidered on the back of this vestment. The illustration of the flowing old English chasuble in the accompanying woodcut (Fig. 5) is from an ancient memorial brass. Here the whole of the eucharistic vestments are depicted, while the position of the priest, in the act of blessing the chalice, is remarkable, for it is unknown in the case of any other brass in existence. The flower (flos carule) of the chasuble was a splendid piece of floriated embroidery round the neck, which spread itself down the

"It was worn as well by laymen as ecclesiastics in very early ages; but in later times its use has been confined exclusively to bishops and priests, and it has become the distinctive official vestment of the holy eucharist. Its primitive form was perfectly round, with an aperture in the centre for the head, and this we find figured in the Benedictional of St. Ethelwold (Fig. 1). If intended for use in processions, a hood was sometimes affixed to the back; for at that period the chasuble was not restricted to the ministry of the altar. There is another form of this vestment, too, almost circular, which appears to be the oldest in existence, figured in the mosaic of St. Vitalli's Church, at Ravenna, the date of which is A.D. 547. In England its shape continued to be nearly circular for about six centuries after the mission of Augustine (Fig. 2). A chasuble discovered about thirty years ago in a walled-up ambry at Waterford, in Ireland, is also of this form. When a change was made, the only alteration seems to have been that two opposite parts of the circumference were made to come to a point. This form was in use for many ages, and is that frequently represented on memorial brasses; but, for about three hundred years before the Reformation, the chasuble was likewise made in the shape of a vestica piscis, and the ornaments with which it was then decorated became far more elaborate, and consequently richer and more beautiful. front and the back—representations of which may be seen in the cathedrals of Exeter, Peterborough, and Lincoln. Three brasses remain of bishops in full eucharistic vestments of post-Reformation periods—viz., Thomas Goodrich, in 1554, at Ely Cathedral; John Bell, bishop of Worcester, in 1556, from St. James's, Clerkenwell, in possession of the late J. G. Nichols, Esq., F.S.A.; and Robert Paraglove, suffragan bishop of Hull, in 1579, at Tideswell, Derbyshire."

"In the Fourth Council of Toledo it was reckoned a sacred habit. Its old English name was Massa hakele, the 'mass mantle.' The word occurs first in the year 474, in the will of St. Perpetuus, of Tours. The Greek chasuble was of equal width all round, from the top to the bottom. The Western form was that of pointed ends behind and before; and the early mosaics of the 6th century show it thus sloping and hollowed, reaching to the feet; but there are other examples which portray it shorter, as it is worn at present, the ends being frequently rounded. A remarkable vestment of this kind at St. Apollinaria, Ravenna, bears the name of the Chasuble of the Diptychs, as it is covered with an auriclave, orphrey, or superhumeral, a band of golden stuff, like an ancient archiepiscopal pall, sewn behind and before, and divided round the neck, covered with the names and beads of thirty-five bishops of Verona, in succession, from the foundation of the see to the middle of the 8th century. The name of auriclave, like orphrey, meaning the 'gold-bordered,' was given to the chasuble from its peculiar embroidery on the onophorion or laticlave, a band originally of a different color from the robe, and called the auriclave when made of cloth of gold. One of this kind, of the 8th century, is preserved in the cathedral of Ravenna. St. Stephen's chasuble, made by Griesella, queen of Hungary, in 1081, is preserved at Buda, and worn by the sovereign at his coronation: its color is green. There are two at Madeley, of the 14th century, which were probably brought from Much-Wenlock. One at Talacre is said to have come from Basingworth. There is one at Salisbury in green and gold, of the 16th century. The chasuble called paludamentum had the pall sewn upon it. Until the 12th or 13th century the pectoral or front did not differ in form from the dorsal or back. The superhumeral dwindled into a narrow collar, and the cross on the back of the chasuble is the last relic of the auriclave. From an early date chasubles were ornamented with sacred designs, flowers, and symbolical animals and birds, a usage permitted by the Second Council of Nicea. The processional chasuble had a hood, which was worn in France until the latter half of the 9th century. In England the ends of the chasuble took the shape of the reversed arch of the pointed style of architecture. From being used specially at the time of celebration, it was emphatically called 'the vestment.' Cramer says, 'The over-vesture or chasuble signifieth the purple mantle that Pilate's soldiers put upon Christ after that they had scourged him; as touching the minister, it signifies charity, a virtue excellent above all other.'"

Château (or Chasteau; in Ital. Castello). GRULAUME, a French engraver, was born at Orleans April 18, 1685, and was instructed in the school of John Frederick Greuter. He died in Paris, Sept. 15, 1688. His principal plates are, The Repose in Egypt: The Virgin, with the Infant Jesus Embracing a Cross: The Miraculous Draught of Fishes: The Baptism of Christ by St. John: Christ Appearing to St. Peter: The Stoning of Stephen: The Holy Family with St. John: St. Paul Taken up to Heaven: Christ Curing the Blind. Chateaubriand, FRANÇOIS AUGUSTE REND, l'écuyer de, a famous French poet, historian, philosopher.

and statesman, was born Sept. 4, 1768, at St. Malo, in Bretagne, and died in Paris, July 4, 1848. He deserves an honorable place in this Cyclopædia as an apologist of Christianity. His first important work in that direction was the Essai Historique, Politique, et Moral sur les Révolutions Anciennes et Modernes, etc. (Lond. 1797, 2 vols.; Paris, 1814):—Génie du Christianisme (Paris, 1802; Germ. transl. by Schneller, 2d ed. Freiburg, 1856-57, 2 vols.). This work, which he dedicated to Bonaparte, placed him at once among the first writers of his people and time. In 1807 he published his Les Martyrs, ou le Triomphe de la Religion Chrétienne (Germ. transl. by Fesemair, Munich, 1864), in which he glorifies the Christian religion. In this work, as well as in his Itinéraire de Paris à Jérusalem et de Jérusalem à Paris, he admonishes, as a good Catholic, his co-religionists to adhere to their Church. His Œuvres Complètes were published at Paris in 1826 and 1838; new edition by Sainte-Beuve, in 12 vols. 1859-61; a German edition of his works was published at Freiburg, 1827-38, in 66 small volumes. See Vinet, Tableau de la Littérat. Franç. au Dix-neuvième Siècle; Sainte-Beuve, Chateaubriand et son Groupe Littéraire sous l'Empire (Paris, 1860, 1878, 2 vols.); Scherer, *Études Critiq. sur la Littér. Château-Gonthier (in Anjou), COUNCIL OF (Concilium apud Castrum Gontherii), was held in 1231, by the archbishop of Tours and his suffragans, who published thirty-seven canons or regulations, of which the following are of most consequence:

1. Against clandestine marriages, ordering that those persons who have been so united be separated.
2. Exacts an oath from every clerk presented to a benefice, to the effect that he had neither directly nor indirectly given or promised anything in return.
3. Orders the bishops to see that all beneficed clerks serve their own cures.
4. Forbids to communicate with excommunicated persons.
5. Forbids the frequent use of general excommunication.
6. Deprives of their patronage patrons who present unfit persons.
7. Forbids to present to a living any one ignorant of the language of the place.
8. And some others relate to the conduct of monks.
9. Orders the sentence of excommunication against usurers to be read every Sunday.
10. Forbids to receive the testimony of Jews against Christians.

See Labbe, Concil. xi, 438.

Châtel, Ferdinand Toussaint François, a French schismatic, was born at Gannat, in Bourbonnais, Jan. 9, 1795. He learned the trade of a tailor, but was afterwards sent by his pastor to the seminary of Mont-Ferrand. After studying theology among the Sulpicians, Châtel received the tonsure at the age of twenty, was ordained a few months after, and made subdeacon the year following. Some time before the revolution of July, he wrote for le Réformateur, foreshadowing his future innovations. Having assembled several discontented priests in his house, he made known to them his projects. He was appointed bishop of the new Church thus formed. The master of the Templars, Fabre-Palapat, consecrated him in 1831. Châtel's creed was based upon a high profession of regard for Jesus Christ as a man, and the invariable order of law exclusively natural. In 1842 a decree of police caused the place of the meetings of Châtel to be shut up, as, according to the contents of the document, he had uttered but outrages against public morals. In the revolution of 1848 Châtel used his eloquence in behalf of what he termed "oppressed women;" and as orator of the club, presided over by madame Niboyet, he was heard several times pleading for divorce, one of the favorite themes of his conventicles. Châtel finally received an appointment at the post-office. He died Feb. 13, 1857, leaving, Sermon à l'Ouverture de la Nouvelle Église Française (8vo):—Profession de Foi de l'Église Catholique Française, etc. (8vo):—Catéchisme à l'Usage de l'Église Catholique Française (1833, 8vo):—Le Code de l'Humanité (1838, 8vo):—A la Chambre des Députés (1843), etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Holzapfel, Die Kirche des Abbe Châtel, in the Zeitschrift für historische Theologie, 1844, iii; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.

Châtel, Jean, a French fanatic, was born in Paris about 1576, and studied divinity under the Jesuits, and philosophy in the University of Paris. He regarded Henry IV as a heretic, and was impelled by religious fanaticism to stab him, Dec. 27, 1594. It was thought that he had been instigated by the Jesuits, but he declared to the last that he acted entirely of his own accord. He was executed Dec. 29, 1594. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Châtellain, JEAN DE, a Flemish preacher, of the order of the Augustines, a native of Tournay, lived in the former part of the 16th century. He preached with success in the principal cities of France and Lorraine. Being accused of favoring Lutheranism, in spite of the protection offered him by the magistrates of Metz, he was arrested and burned at the stake as a heretic, Jan. 12, 1525. Calmet attributes to him the La Chronique de la Ville de Metz, in rhyme (Metz, 1698, 12mo); but this was written by Jean Châtel. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Châtenier, BERNARD, a French prelate, native of Montpellier, distinguished himself by his knowledge of civil and canon law. He settled at Rome, and was auditor of the sacred palace under Gregory X. After having been chaplain of the pope and archdeacon in the Church of Narbonne, he was appointed to the bishopric of Alby in 1276. Nicholas III commissioned him to make inquests in the diocese of Lodève against those who had usurped church benefices, and Philippe le Bel sent him to Rome to procure the canonization of St. Louis. In 1306 Châtenier was transferred to the see of Le Puy in Velay. He was made cardinal by pope John XXII in 1316, and died at Avignon, Aug. 14, 1317. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chater, John (1), an English Independent, was born in London and educated at Plasterers' Hall. He became a member of Mr. Bradbury's Church at New Court, Carey Street, in 1752; was dismissed to take charge of the Church at Newport, Isle of Wight, in 1755, and returned to London in 1758, where he settled as pastor at Silver Street. In 1765 he adopted the Sandemanian opinions, became a preacher among them, and commenced a bookselling business, first on Ludgate Hill, then, in 1769, at King Street, Cheapside, where he kept a circulating library. He wrote Tom Ripby, a religious novel, and a pamphlet with the title Another High-road to Hell, in which he denounced some of the pulpit entertainments of that time (1767). See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iii, 111-113.

Chater, John (2), an English Congregational minister, was born at Coventry, Feb. 16, 1805. He was carefully trained by his parents, and when about twenty-one joined the Church, engaged in village preaching, and soon after entered Hackney College. At the close of his college course he accepted a call to Lindfield, Sussex, where he labored until 1842, then removed to Newton Abbott, and there remained till 1864. Ill-health then obliging his resignation, he retired to Southport, and there died, Jan. 12, 1869. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1870, p. 281.

Chatfield, LARSON, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Windham, Greene County, N. Y., Sept. 7, 1807. He spent his early years on his father's farm; was gifted in the use of the English language; joined the Church at the age of twenty-two; and in 1836 entered the old Ohio Conference. On the formation of the Michigan Conference he became one of its members; was transferred to the Rock River Conference in 1853; returned to the Michigan Conference in the year following, located, and in 1868 was readmitted as a superannuate, which relation he sustained until his death, July 23, 1876. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 113.

Chatizel (de la Néronnière), PIERRE JOSEPH, a French theologian, was born at Laval in 1733. The province of Maine chose him as one of her representatives in the states-general. He was afterwards vicar of the Trinité de Laval, and later pastor of Soulaïnes, in the department of Maine and Loire. He died at Angers in 1817, leaving, Traité du Pouvoir des Evêques sur les Empêchements du Mariage (Paris, 1789, 12mo):—Lettre de M. . . , Curé du Diocèse d'Angers, au Père Vialar (1791, 8vo):—Lettre Adressée à Pie VI (Lond. without date, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chatterton, Benjamin, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Acworth, N. H., in 1778. He was converted in 1805, and soon began to preach; was baptized among the Methodists, and was a class-leader. In 1823 he connected himself with the Free-will Baptist Church in Middlesex, Vt., and was ordained Feb. 3, 1828. His ministerial work was performed chiefly in his own town and in places adjoining. After a long and painful sickness, borne with much Christian resignation, he died at Middlesex, June 17, 1855. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1857, p. 88. (J. C. S.)

Chatterton, Jason, an English Wesleyan missionary, arrived at Barbadoes, W. I., Dec. 26, 1851, labored with burning zeal and great success, and died Oct. 29, 1852. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1853.

Chatto, ANDREW, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1737; presented to the living at Merebatle in 1739; ordained in 1740; and died June 20, 1770, aged fifty-four years. See Fasts Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 465.

Chattun Erdeni (the white maiden), in Lamaism, was a picture painted on gold, belonging to the seven Dolon Erdeni, the sacred relics of the Lamaian temple, placed on the altar before the image of the deity.

Chaucer, GEOFFREY, the "Father of English Poetry," is believed to have been born about 1340. Nothing is known of his early life or parentage further than that his father was a London vintner. Chaucer was not simply a poet and author, but exhibited decided talent for diplomacy, and his acquaintance with commerce and his ability in that direction secured for him some important positions. He was a contemporary of Wycliffe, and is said to have adopted the opinions of that reformer respecting ecclesiastical polity, although it is not known that he sympathized with him in his religious convictions. His influence, however, was not inconsiderable in preparing the way for the Reformation in England.

Chaucer first comes into public notice in 1359, when he went with the army of Edward III into France, and there, during a retreat, was taken prisoner, but was soon ransomed by the king. About 1367 he was valet of the king's chamber, with a salary for life of twenty marks, and in 1369 took part in another expedition against France, which proved to be an inglorious one. It is believed that he married Philippa, a lady in attendance on the queen, before 1374, for in that year a pension was granted to him for his own and his wife's services. For several years he was employed on public missions in France, Flanders, and Lombardy, and during one of these he may have met Petrarch in Padua. There are evident traces of the effect of Italian literature on all his writings after this journey. In 1382 he became comptroller of the petty customs of the port of London, and in 1386 was sent to parliament as a Knight of Kent. But in the same year came the downfall of his patron, John of Gaunt, and in consequence he was dismissed from all his offices. In this year occurred the death of his wife. She left him two sons, one of whom was named Lewis. Chaucer was afterwards made clerk of the king's works, and in 1394 obtained an annuity of £20, and a pension of 40 marks on the accession of Henry IV in 1399. It is believed that he died at his house in Westminster in 1400, and an inscription on his tomb in the abbey fixes the date Oct. 23.

Chaucer's style marks the beginning of the modern period of English literature, and his language and forms of expression were so excellent that few of them have yet become obsolete. Among all his writings the Canterbury Tales are best known and most admired. In them, as well as in the House of Fame and Legends of Good Women, Chaucer strikes out more positively in a style of his own, and exhibits a maturer power and a more masterly freedom than in his earlier works. His characters are sharply defined, living men and women. His narrative skill is unequalled, his tales gliding on with captivating artistic fluency and unobtrusive felicities of phrase. He unites luxurious invention and piercing satiric shrewdness with delicate pathos, sunny humor, grave love of truth, and refreshing delight in nature. There is little to show the date of his various writings. The Book of the Duchess is supposed to have been written to commemorate the death of the wife of John of Gaunt, which occurred in 1369. Many works formerly attributed to him are now rejected; among them the Testament of Love, the Assembly of Ladies, and the Lamentations of Mary Magdalene. In the last twenty years there has been a remarkable revival of interest in Chaucer and an enthusiastic study of his life and works, a society having been formed in England for that purpose. The best editions of his works are those of Morris (Lond. 1872, 6 vols. 12mo) and Gilman (Boston, 1873, 8 vols. 8vo).

Chauchemer (or Ciaucemer), FRANÇOIS, a French theologian, was born at Blois. At the age of fifteen he entered the order of the Dominicans and was sent to Paris, to study at the convent of St. Jacques. He distinguished himself there by the ingenuity of his discussions and his ready elocution. He was made doctor of theology in 1673, and acquired such a reputation by his sermons that he was nominated preacher to the king, with a pension of three hundred livres. In 1678 he became provincial of Paris, and in 1687, prior of the grand convent of Paris. He spent the latter part of his life in composing several works, of which the majority remained in MS. He died Jan. 6, 1713, leaving, among other books, Traité de Fidé, etc. (Paris, 1707):—Sermons (ibid. 1709). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chauchon, a French theologian, who lived in the middle of the last century, wrote, La Journée Sainte (Paris, 1742, 12mo):—Réflexions sur la Discrétion (Le Mans, 1762, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chauffepié, Jacques Georges de, a Dutch Protestant preacher of French extraction, was born Nov. 9, 1702, at Leuwarden. He was pastor successively of the Walloon churches at Flessingen, Delft, and Amsterdam, and was a zealous preacher. He died at Amsterdam, July 3, 1786, leaving, Diss. Philol. de Supplicio Crucis apud Hebræos (Franker, 1730):—Sermons sur Divers Textes (ed. by Sm. Chauffepié, Amsterdam, 1787, 3 vols.). But his main work is his Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique et Critique, which is a continuation of that of Bayle (ibid. 1750-56, 4 vols. fol.). Chaumont, Pierre Marie Joseph, a Roman Catholic missionary, was born near Chatillon-sur-Seine in 1611. He entered the society of Jesus at Rome in 1632; went to Canada in 1639; was sent to the Huron River mission, and remained there till 1650; became missionary to the Onondagas in 1655, and, with father Claude Dablon, founded a permanent mission on the banks of the lake where the city of Syracuse now stands. In November, 1655, these missionaries began the construction of St. Mary's chapel, which was the first church in New York state where mass was offered. This was the beginning of extensive missionary work among the Indian tribes, carried on by the early heroic Catholic missionaries, such as Mercia, Menard, Ragueneau, Dupéron, and others. Chaumont died at Lorette, near Quebec, Feb. 21, 1693. He wrote a grammar of the Huron language. See Shea, Catholic Missions, p. 98-241; De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the United States, p. 314.

Chaumont, Denis, a French missionary, was born at Éragny, near Gisors, Nov. 15, 1752. After preliminary theological studies, he entered, in 1775, the seminary of foreign missions. For six years he was employed in the province of Fo-Kien, in China, and was called back in 1784, to become director of the Seminary of Paris. In 1792 he went to England, where he devoted himself to the interests of Catholic missions. During the French Revolution he had the oversight of the missionaries. On his return to France, in 1814, his fellows chose him superior of the seminary, in which position he remained until his death, Aug. 25, 1819. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chaumont, Paul Philippe de, a French theologian, after receiving holy orders, devoted himself for several years to preaching, and then succeeded his father as librarian of the cabinet, and was admitted as a member of the Académie Française in 1654. He was appointed to the bishopric of Apt in 1671, but gave in his resignation in 1684, and came back to Paris, where he devoted himself more than ever to study, and died March 24, 1697, leaving, Réflexions sur le Christianisme Enseigné dans l'Eglise Catholique (Paris, 1693, 2 vols. 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chauncey, Peter S., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was a graduate of the General Theological Seminary, New York city. For ten years he was rector of Christ Church, Rye, N. Y.; became rector of Christ Church, Hartford, Conn., in 1848, and removed to St. James's, New York city, in 1850, of which parish he was rector until his death, Dec. 14, 1866, aged fifty-six. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1868, p. 104; Amer. Quar. Church Rev. April, 1867, p. 153.

Chauncey, Elnathan, a Congregational minister, was born Sept. 10, 1724, at Durham, Conn., and graduated in 1743 from Harvard College. He studied theology with his father, Rev. Nathaniel Chauncey, and for some time was his assistant. In consequence of ill-health he gave up preaching, and for several years devoted himself to agriculture, and afterwards accepted an appointment as captain of a military company. He resumed preaching during the last years of his life, and died May 4, 1796. See Chauncey Memorial, p. 175-177. (J. C. S.)

Chauncey, Isaac, a Congregational minister, was born at Stratford, Conn., Oct. 5, 1670, and graduated from Harvard College in 1693. He was ordained Sept. 9, 1796, at Hadley, Mass., and continued pastor till his death in May, 1745. He was of a truly peaceable and catholic spirit; a good scholar; an eloquent orator; an able divine; a lively, pathetic preacher. See Chauncey Memorial, p. 221. (J. C. S.)

Chauncey, Israel, a Congregational minister, younger son of president Chauncey of Harvard College, was born at Scituate, Mass., in 1644, and graduated from Harvard in 1661. He was surgeon as well as chaplain in the army. In 1665 he was ordained pastor of the Church in Stratford, Conn., and was its learned and devoted pastor until his death in 1703. His name appears as second on the list of the founders of Yale College. He was chosen, Nov. 11, 1701, rector or president of the infant institution, but did not accept. See Chauncey Memorial, p. 206-213. (J. C. S.)

Chauncey, Maurice, a monk of the Charter-house, London, was imprisoned in the reign of Henry VIII, for refusing to own the king's supremacy. He managed to remain unmolested in England and in Flanders until the accession of queen Mary, when he was replaced at a monastery at Shene, near Richmond. On the queen's death he again went to Flanders, but was obliged to remove to Bruges, where he died, July 15, 1581. The best of his productions is entitled Historia Aliquot Nostræ Sæculi Martyrum (Mentz, 1550, 4to).

Chauncey, Nathaniel, a Congregational minister, was born at Hatfield, Mass., Sept. 25, 1681. He was the son of Rev. Nathaniel Chauncey, and grandson of Charles Chauncey, president of Harvard College. In his boyhood he was sent to his uncle, Rev. Israel Chauncey, of Stratford, Conn., under whom he prepared for college, and was one of the first class of six enrolled on the catalogue of Yale College. After graduating he went to Durham in 1706, and was ordained Feb. 7, 1711. He died there Feb. 1, 1756. His library was large and well selected. In his tastes and acquisitions he was a theological scholar of the Puritan type. As a preacher he was eminently instructive and attractive. His elocution was distinct, and his language carefully chosen. He was a fellow of Yale College. Frequently he had young men under his care preparing for college. His counsel was often sought for by neighboring churches. He published some Sermons (1719, 1734). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 263.

Chautauqua Assembly is the name given to an annual summer gathering for purposes of instruction, worship, and recreation. Its meetings open early in July and continue about six weeks. The place is a well-wooded point of land jutting out into the beautiful Lake Chautauqua, a body of water about twenty miles long by two wide, and over fourteen hundred feet above the level of the sea. It is in western New York, ten miles from Lake Erie, and seven hundred feet above it. The assembly grounds contain about one hundred and fifty acres, and are four hundred and sixty miles from New York city, four hundred and twenty-five from Cincinnati and five hundred and thirty from Chicago. The air is pure, the water good, the grounds well-shaded, and the entire place and its neighborhood are noted for salubrity.

I. History.—This place, known as Fair Point, had been used for two years as a camp-meeting, under the control of an association chartered for that purpose, and consisting of a number of prominent members of the Methodist Episcopal Church in western New York and in several adjoining states. Among these was Mr. Lewis Miller of Akron, Ohio, a man of broad views and great force of character, and especially interested in Sunday-school work. When his friend, the Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., Corresponding Secretary of the Sunday-school Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church, conferred with him on the subject of a Sunday-school Institute to be held for several weeks, Mr. Miller suggested that it be held in the woods, and afterwards proposed the ground by Chautauqua Lake as the place for holding it. It is worthy of mention here, that several years before this time Mr. Silas Farmer, of Detroit, Michigan, had suggested the idea of a "Sunday-school Camp-Meeting." (See Sunday-school Journal, April, 1870, p. 155.) Nothing, however, came from it at that time. Dr. Vincent, who had years before organized the first Sunday-school Institute ever held, had for a long time cherished the thought that it might be possible, as it would certainly be desirable, to gather Sunday-school teachers in a meeting for instruction and practice, which should last a much longer time than the ordinary institute; and when Mr. Miller suggested the grove at Fair Point as the place he accepted the suggestion. There was accordingly held for fourteen days, in August, 1874, a meeting, with this object in view, and called the "Sunday-school Assembly." The attendance was large, and so deep was the interest excited that, before the assembly was dissolved, there was by formal action a unanimous desire expressed that another assembly might be held the following year.

For several years the meetings were thus held, especially for Sunday-school teachers. The success was so great that, in 1875, an organization was formed which bought the property from the Camp-Meeting Association, and has ever since held it for the purposes of the assembly. The plans of work broadened with each successive year. Very early in the history of the assembly Dr. Vincent suggested the desirability of adding to the programme a scientific conference. The idea was soon carried into execution. Since then the Chautauqua Assembly, while it has retained in its original enthusiasm and power the idea of instruction in Sunday-school work, has greatly broadened its scope, until now it includes every branch of human knowledge. It places the Bible at the very centre and foundation of its work, seeking to study the word of God and the works of God. The religious element is predominant in all its operations, though there is perfect freedom from asceticism, cant, and sectarianism. Abundant provision is made for innocent recreation, but late hours, dancing, and cards are forbidden.

II. Organization.—There are at present in the assembly seven different departments besides the Chautauqua School of Theology, and the Chautauqua University, separately noted below.

1. The Chautauqua Assembly Normal Department.—This comprises the Sunday-school Assembly with which the movement started, and includes five classes: (1) The Chautauqua Children's Class; (2) The Chautauqua Intermediate Class, for youths and adults; (3) The Chautauqua Sunday-school Normal Class, for parents and Sunday-school teachers; (4) The Chautauqua Advanced Normal, which has a post-graduate course in biblical and normal class work; (5) The Primary Teachers' Union, for primary-class teachers.

2. The Chautauqua Teachers' Retreat, begun in 1879. Teachers of secular schools may attend this during their summer vacation, and in the intervals of recreation and of rest have the advantage of a summer school under the direction of some of the foremost educators of the age. Lectures are delivered on the Philosophy and Methods of Teaching, and on other subjects of practical interest to teachers.

3. The Chautauqua School of Languages, begun in 1879. The object of this is to familiarize teachers with what is known as "the natural method" of teaching the modern languages, as well as to illustrate other methods in both ancient and modern languages, and to increase popular interest in philological studies.

4. The Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle, begun in 1878. This is one of the grandest educational conceptions of the day. It aims to help the large number of people, old as well as young, but especially the young, who have a desire to read, but do not know what to read. For all such, courses of reading are marked out, and text books indicated, many of them being specially prepared for the purpose. These courses of reading are peculiarly adapted for busy people, who can take but little time from their daily toil or their domestic cares. An average of forty minutes for each week-day, or four hours a week, will take one through one of these annual courses of reading in nine months. It is not necessary that the members of the "Circle" should ever come to Chautauqua, though every summer there is a large gathering of them at that place. It is expected, however, that members will fill out memoranda of their reading, and send them to the central office at Plainfield, N. J.

The course of reading of the "C. L. S. C.," as it is called by abbreviation, is not by any means designed as a substitute for a regular collegiate course of study. While it covers the college outlook, it is rather designed for those who have not had the advantage of such a training, and yet who have a thirst for knowledge. Already in a number of instances it has awakened in some of its youthful readers an ardent desire for a thorough collegiate course, and has started them on the way. At the same time it is designed to help men of business who are college graduates of former years in reviving the studies and literary pursuits of their earlier days. So popular is this new movement that the "C. L. S. C." now numbers sixty thousand members engaged in one or another of a four years' course of reading. It has over one thousand local "circles," numbering from three students to several hundred each. These are to be found in all parts of the United States, even in Alaska, and also in Canada, Great Britain, India, China, Japan, and the Sandwich Islands. The first class was graduated in 1882, after having pursued the four years' course of reading, and numbered over seventeen hundred. The second class, which graduated in 1883, consisted of nearly thirteen hundred members.

5. The Chautauqua Young Folks' Reading Union, begun in 1881. For this there is an annual course of entertaining reading provided. The design is to drive out interesting bad books by interesting good books. It is especially intended for children and young people.

6. The Chautauqua Missionary Institute.—This is designed to increase interest in domestic and foreign missions.

7. The Chautauqua College of Music, begun in 1880. This, as its name implies, aims at the cultivation of the science and of the art of music.

III. General Characteristics and Accessories.—Life at Chautauqua would be anything but rest should one undertake to attend all the different meetings. He would be kept busy from early in the morning until late at night, with but little intermission for recreation or food. But this would be clearly an abuse of the design of the assembly, and would be as unwise as if one should visit Saratoga for his health and drink of all the different springs as rapidly as he could ride from one to another. There is abundant time for recreation and for rest to those who wish them, as most of the visitors do. Each must make a selection of the lectures or other exercises of the day he wishes to attend, and leave the others to those who prefer them. Various departments of instruction are in operation simultaneously. Then there are certain hours in the morning and evening when all exercises are closed excepting the popular lecture, or concert, or addresses in the amphitheatre. If one be so disposed he may absent himself from all these, and spend the entire day roaming the woods, or sailing on the lake, or quietly seated in tent or cottage, and then at half-past ten at night go to bed at the sound of the chimes of bells, generally sure of being undisturbed until the same faithful sentinels shall announce the coming of six o'clock in the morning.

The appliances for the educational purposes designed are very complete at Chautauqua. The original auditorium consisted merely of rough benches fixed under the shade of the forest trees, and a large covered platform. There were sittings for about three thousand people. This old place of gathering still remains, and is frequently used, but it long since became too small for the immense congregations who gather in Chautauqua. Five or six years ago an amphitheatre was built, or, to speak more correctly, an amphitheatre which nature had made was seated and roofed over. This will easily accommodate six thousand people. It has an immense pipe-organ for Sabbath worship and for concerts, and is the favorite place for the great lecturers and preachers who every year delight Chautauqua audiences. There are also other buildings for smaller audiences: the Hall of Philosophy; the Children's Temple; the Chapel; the Normal Pavilion.

Besides these places for audiences there are places devoted to education through the eye. "Newton Hall" has a Museum of Art and of Sacred and General Archaeology. There is a model of the Holy Land nearly three hundred feet long, with Lake Chautauqua to represent the Mediterranean sea. There is a model of the City of Jerusalem; and a sectional model of the Great Pyramid.

During the height of the assembly season, a daily paper is published on the grounds, edited by the Rev. T. L. Flood, D.D. It has eight large pages and forty-eight columns, and is called The Assembly Herald. There is also a monthly magazine known as The Chautauquan, a quarto of seventy-two pages, under the same editorship. These periodicals are devoted to the interests of the Chautauqua Assembly. In them are published reports of the various meetings held and of the lectures and addresses delivered. Besides this The Chautauquan has several series of papers to be read or studied in the course of reading prescribed for the "C. L. S. C."

The attendance at Chautauqua, especially at the height of the season, is something wonderful. The residents for the term and the casual visitors are numbered by the ten thousand. In 1883 the receipts from all sources were forty thousand dollars, of which nearly thirty thousand dollars were taken at the gate, as payment for admission to the premises. The entire receipts are devoted to the payment of expenses and to the improvement of the grounds. The men to whom the management is intrusted, and who do the most important part of the work, receive no pay for their services, and, if the whole truth were known, it would probably be found that they are sometimes out of pocket. Their work is purely a labor of love, and they consider themselves well paid in beholding the results. (J. M. F.)

CHAUTAUQUA SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY is a chartered institution connected with the Chautauqua Assembly, and incorporated by the New York Legislature in 1881. It is intended for the benefit of young ministers, or of older ones who may wish to review their early studies. It has an elaborate and thorough course. Its work is divided into eight regular departments and four special, each department being under the direction of a dean. The regular departments are: 1. Hebrew; 2. New Testament Greek; 3. Biblical Theology; 4. Historical Theology; 5. Practical Theology; 6. Christian Science and Philosophy; 7. Human Nature; 8. Literature and Art. The special departments are: 1. The Relation between Body and Soul; 2. Elocution; 3. Industrial Economy and Trade; 4. Jurisprudence.

The business of the school is conducted by correspondence. The studies prescribed are to be pursued at home. Full and rigid examinations are held in the presence of competent committees, under the direction of the deans of the various departments. Should the student pass satisfactory examinations on all the studies he will receive the degree of "Bachelor of Divinity." The studies of the eight departments will require four or five years to complete. No honorary degrees of any kind will be conferred. The degree of Doctor of Divinity will be conferred only upon graduates of the Chautauqua School of Theology who pass special examinations for this degree, and who also hold positions of prominence in their respective denominations.

This school is not designed as a substitute for the ordinary theological seminaries of the various churches. It does not claim to be even a rival to them, but rather seeks to supplement their work. It is undenominational in its character. It is at present, and has been from the beginning, under the presidency of the Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D. The dean of the school is the Rev. A. A. Wright, Boston, Mass.

Besides the deans of the several departments there is a board of "counsellors," and also a secretary of the archaeological department. There has already been made the beginning of an archaeological library and museum. The design is to have a collection of books, manuscripts, charts, plans, and casts, to assist in the study of the Scriptures. This collection is kept at Chautauqua.

The whole number of students enrolled at the time of the last report (April, 1884) was three hundred and seven. They are divided among the various denominations and are to be found in all parts of the country.

Connected with the school is the JERUSALEM CHAMBER OF THEOLOGY, the design of which is to furnish ministers, lay-preachers, Y. M. C. A. workers, evangelists, Sunday-school officers and teachers courses of non-professional studies covering the entire field of theological, religious, and ethical literature. These departments are arranged with special adaptation to ministers who, from any cause, are unable to pursue with profit the regular curriculum in the sacred languages. The departments under survey are as follows: 1. Historical Theology; 2. Homiletics; 3. Biblical Theology; 4. Doctrinal Theology; 5. Genesis of Man; 6. Sociology (Christian and Pagan); 7. Literature and Art; 8. Religious Biography; 9. Palestine Exploration; 10. Archaeology; 11. Hermeneutics, Old Testament; 12. Hermeneutics, New Testament; 13. Ancient History; 14. Modern History; 15. Philosophy; 16. Mental Science; 17. Philology; 18. Metaphysics; 19. Psychology; 20. Agnosticism; 21. Oriental Travels; 22. Christianity and the Sciences; 23. The Evidences of Christianity; 24. The Great Religions; 25. Greek and Roman History; 26. The Barbaric Incursions; 27. The Ancient Monarchies; 28. The Hebrew and Greek Scriptures; 29. Art and Religion; 30. Christian Missions; 31. The business of this chamber is conducted by correspondence, the same as that of the school. A special session of the Chautauqua School of Theology is held for about four weeks during the summer, at Chautauqua; during this session oral lectures are delivered by the professors. (J. M. F.)

CHAUTAUQUA UNIVERSITY is an outgrowth of the Chautauqua Assembly, and was chartered by the legislature of the state of New York in 1883. There are in operation, as part of this university, colleges of Latin, Greek, German, French, and English, the studies of which are prosecuted by students at their homes, by a system of correspondence, with most rigid written examinations. Other colleges, in science, etc., will be organized in a short time. The university is governed by a chancellor and a board of directors. (J. M. F.)

Chautrun. See GUDRUN.

Chauveau, François, a French painter, designer, and engraver, was born at Paris in 1613, and studied under Laurent de Lahire. The number of his plates is 4000. He was admitted into the Royal Academy of Painting and Sculpture in 1663. The following are his principal works: The Annunciation; The Repose in Egypt; The Virgin and Infant with St. John; The Crucifixion; The Mystery of the Sacrament; Christ with the Disciples at Emmaus; The Nativity; The Holy Family. He died at Paris, Feb. 3, 1676. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Chauvelin, Henri Philippe, a French theologian, was born about 1716. He was very active in politico-religious affairs, especially in hostility to the Jesuits. In 1750 he wrote on the subject of ecclesiastical immunities, and the parliament of Paris, in 1753, issued a decree, in consequence of which he was arrested with three of his colleagues, and imprisoned at Mt. Saint-Michel. On recovering his liberty Chauvelin commenced another series of attacks upon the Jesuits, which, on May 9, 1767, resulted in their banishment. He died Jan. 14, 1770. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chauvin, Pierre, a French philosopher and Protestant theologian of the latter part of the 17th century (often confounded with ÉTIENNE), belongs probably to a family of this name originating at Toulouse. He fled to Holland after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and became pastor of a French Church there. He wrote De Religione Naturali, etc. (Rotterdam, 1693, 8vo), intended to show that revealed religion has its foundation in natural religion, and to plead for the tolerance of theologians of that period. It excited a lively opposition, against which he defended himself in Éclaircissements sur un Livre de la Religion Naturelle (ibid. ed.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chauvineau (or Chavineau), André, a French theologian of the order of Franciscans, who lived in the former part of the 17th century, wrote, La Mort de P. Ange de Joyeuse (Tours, 1608, 8vo):—La Mort de Louis de Lorraine (Paris, 1623, 12mo):—Lettre d'un Solitaire au roi Princes et Seigneurs (Poitiers, 1628, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chavarigites were a Mohammedan sect who disbelieved Mohammed's infallibility.

Chazinzarians (Armen. chazus, a cross) were a sect which arose in Armenia in the 7th century, accused of worshipping the cross. They held an annual feast in honor of the dog of their false prophet Sergius.

Chazzan is the reader or chanter in a Jewish synagogue (q. v.).

Cheatle, George, an English Baptist, was born at Castle Donington, Leicestershire. He was converted in early life, baptized in the river Trent, at Sawley, at the age of sixteen, and soon afterwards began to preach. In 1809 he visited Birmingham as a supply to the Lombard Street Church, which was followed by a unanimous call to the pastorate, and he settled there in January, 1810. Fifty years afterwards, in a jubilee pamphlet, he surveyed the great changes which had taken place. He had commenced with seventeen members, had preached seven thousand sermons, baptized seven hundred persons, and drafted from his church as many members as formed a new General Baptist Church in Birmingham. He lived a useful life, and died Feb. 24, 1870.

Chebius, a Welsh saint. See CYBI.

Checkley, John, a missionary of the Church of England, was born at Boston, Mass., in 1686. After studying at the grammar school in his native city, he completed his education at Oxford; travelled throughout Europe, collecting valuable paintings, manuscripts, etc., and was again in Boston in 1715. A pamphlet was published by him in 1723, entitled A Modest Proof of the Order and Government Settled by Christ and his Apostles in the Church—devoted to the interests of the Church of England. This called forth an elaborate answer from Dr. Wigglesworth, of Harvard College, and was the beginning of the first great controversy on the subject of episcopacy in this country. During the same year he published a book bearing on the same subject, but opposing deists and dissenters alike. This gave great offence, both in America and in Great Britain. In 1727 he went to England for ordination; but, in consequence of the opposition from certain Congregational ministers of Marblehead, Mass., the bishop of London refused to ordain him, and he returned to America disappointed. In 1739 he went again to England, succeeded in obtaining ordination, and was sent as a missionary to Providence, R. I. Besides preaching there he officiated, at intervals, in Warwick and Attleborough, this pastorate extending over fourteen years. He died at Providence, Feb. 15, 1753. Dr. Elliot declares that he was an excellent linguist, well acquainted with Hebrew, Latin, and Greek, as well as many of the languages of the North American Indians. Witty stories and ludicrous tricks are ascribed to him, and he frequently offended others by the strong expression of his own opinions. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 109.

Checkley, Samuel (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Boston, Mass., and graduated from Harvard College in 1715. He was ordained the first minister of the New or South Church, in Boston, Nov. 22, 1719, and died Dec. 1, 1769, aged seventy-three years. He published several pamphlets. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 313.

Checkley, Samuel (2), a Congregational minister, son of the foregoing, was born at Boston, Mass., and graduated from Harvard College in 1743. He was settled over the Old or North Church, Boston, as colleague with the Rev. Joseph Gee, Sept. 3, 1747; and died March 19, 1768. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 313.

Checquer (Chequer, or Checker) is the officer, or place of business, of a monastic bursar or financial officer.

Cheddu, bishop of the East Angles. See CRDDA.

Chederles, in Oriental mythology, was a Turkish hero, similar to Saint George of the Christians, and, as there is reason to believe, based upon the latter, and modified according to the fashion of Eastern countries.

Chedsey, William, D.D., an English Roman Catholic divine, became prebendary of London in 1548, canon of Windsor in 1554, archdeacon of Middlesex in 1556, prebendary of Oxford in 1557, and president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in 1558. He was deprived of all his preferments in 1559 for not taking the oath of supremacy, and committed to the Fleet Prison. He published several sermons and disputations. See Le Nève, Fusti; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Chedwalla. See C&DWALLA.

Chedworth, John, a bishop in England in the reign of Henry VI, was a native of Gloucestershire, and educated at King's College, Cambridge. He was third provost of the same college for six years; elected bishop of Lincoln, and, with bishop Wainfleet of Winchester, was, at the instance of Henry VI, on a commission to regulate the statutes of Eton and King's colleges. He was bishop for eighteen years, and died in 1471. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 555.

Cheek, SAMUEL BEST, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Columbia, Ky., May 30, 1824, and graduated from Centre College in 1843. He studied theology in Allegheny Seminary, and, entering the middle class at Princeton, studied there more than a year; was ordained by the Presbytery of Transylvania, Oct. 8, 1850; was pastor at Columbia, Shiloh, and Edmonton, Ky., in 1850 and 1851; stated supply at Mt. Pleasant in 1863 and 1864; teacher in the Deaf-and-Dumb Asylum at Danville from 1852 until his death, May 10, 1869. See Gen. Cat. Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 155.

Cheese, IN THE EUCHARIST. See ELEMENTS.

Cheeseman, LEWIS, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Princetown, N. Y., Oct. 27, 1803; and, being left an orphan when a child, struggled with poverty in securing an education. He was licensed by the Bath Presbytery when nineteen years of age, and commenced his labors at Angelica. In 1826 he was called to Albion, where his labors were greatly blessed; in 1830, to Byron; in 1831, to Scottsville; in 1848, to the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, Pa. In 1856 he published a book, entitled Ishmael and the Church; and in 1859 was made superintendent of the Board of Publication of the Presbyterian Church. He died Dec. 21, 1861. Dr. Cheeseman was an energetic and faithful student. He adopted the extempore style for the pulpit. "His nice choice of words and his rich imagery were wonderful." See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1863, p. 144.

Cheesewright, JOSEPH, an English Wesleyan minister, was a native of Lincolnshire. He entered the ministry in 1818; retired from the itinerant labors in 1852, and died May 4, 1861. Cheerful, and generous to the poor, he was respected and beloved. His style of speaking was colloquial, with illustrations drawn from ordinary life. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1861, p. 19.

Cheesman, DANIEL, a Baptist minister, was born in Boston, July 15, 1787. He was converted at an early age, and baptized Oct. 30, 1803. He graduated from Brown University in 1811. Soon after he was licensed by the Second Baptist Church in Boston, in July, 1812. He was ordained shortly afterwards, and settled in Warren, R. I., for two years, and then at Hallowell, Me., for nine years, where the membership of the Church increased under his care from fifty to one hundred and fifty. He was next settled at Lynn, Mass., four years, baptizing, during this period, one hundred and twenty-five persons. He removed in 1834 to Barnstable, and labored most acceptably until his death, May 21, 1839. He was one of the most useful and honored ministers of his denomination in the times in which he lived. See Christian Watchman, June 14, 1839. (J. C. S.)

Cheesman, JARVIS, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Mereworth, Kent, Feb. 8, 1803. He joined the Church in 1825, entered the ministry in 1830, became a supernumerary in 1865, settled in Haverford-West, and died Feb. 3, 1866. His ministry was valued. He was amiable and courteous, and was faithful and firm in the discharge of duty. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1866, p. 20.

Cheeswright, JAMES HENRY, an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted in his sixteenth year, sent to the West Indies in 1853, and died at Puerto Plata, San Domingo, August, 1856, in the twenty-sixth year of his age. He overcame difficulties, conciliated the hostile, strengthened the feeble, and aroused the careless. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1857.

Cheetham, CHARLES, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Heywood, near Manchester, in 1794. He united with the Church at the age of twelve; commenced his ministry in 1823; retired, broken by sickness, in 1854; and died May 12, 1858. Mr. Cheetham was an animated preacher. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1858.

Cheever, AMOS, a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Samuel Cheever of Marblehead, Mass. He graduated from Harvard College in 1707; was ordained at Manchester, Nov. 17, 1716; and died Jan. 15, 1756. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 253.

Cheever, EBENEZER, a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1787. He was converted in his twentieth year, and graduated from Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Me., in 1817. He accepted a call to Mount Vernon Congregational Church, N. H., in 1819; in 1824 became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Waterford, N. Y., and there labored for six years with zeal and success. In 1834 he took charge of the First Presbyterian Church of Newark, N. J., which under his administration, for twelve years, greatly prospered. About 1847 he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church in Tecumseh, Mich.; in 1851 received a call to Ypsilanti, and in 1855 returned to New Jersey, and established Hillside Seminary, in West Bloomfield. He died Dec. 31, 1866. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 287.

Cheever, SAMUEL, a Congregational minister, son of the noted schoolmaster, Ezekiel Cheever, was born at New Haven, Conn., Sept. 22, 1639. He graduated from Harvard College in 1659; was ordained pastor of the Church in Marblehead, Mass., Aug. 13, 1684, after having preached there sixteen years, and died May 29, 1724. Mr. Cheever was distinguished for his thorough knowledge of the Scriptures, and for the earnestness and simplicity of his preaching. For forty-eight years he was never hindered from performing the duties of his office a single Sabbath. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 253.

Cheever, THOMAS, a Congregational minister, brother of the preceding, graduated from Harvard College in 1677; was ordained at Malden, Mass., July 27, 1681; and was dismissed in consequence of charges being sustained against him, May 20, 1686. After living many years in retirement he recovered public confidence, was installed first pastor of the Church in Chelsea, Oct. 19, 1715, and died Nov. 27, 1749, aged ninety-three years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 144.

Cheever, WILLIAM M., a Presbyterian minister, was born at North Vernon, Ind., Sept. 23, 1818. He graduated at Hanover College, Ia., and at Lane Theological Seminary in 1843; became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Kansas City, Mo., and died there June 2, 1878. (W. P. S.)

Chef is a name for a reliquary head. There is a fine one of St. Candidus, of the 9th or 10th century, of wood plated with silver, preserved in a church of Geneva. One of St. Eustachius, from Basle, of the 13th century, is in the British Museum. At Chichester there was a chapel of St. Richard's Head.

Chefez (in Italian, Gentile), MOSES, a Jewish writer of Italy, was born at Trieste about 1663, and died at Venice in 1711. He is the author of מְלִצְתָּה מִפְּחָדֵי הַמָּוֶת, A Philosophical Commentary on the Pentateuch (Venice, 1710):—הַקִּנְיָן הַפְּרָזִי, or A Description and Explanation of the Second Temple (ibid. 1696). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 172; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 80 sq.; Luzzatto, Mose Chefetz, in Lit.-Blatt. des Orients, 1847, No. 18. (B. P.)

Cheffontaines (in Low Breton, Penfentenion, in Latin, A Capite fontium), CHRISTOPHE DE, a French theologian, was born in the bishopric of Lyons about 1532. He entered the Franciscan order, taught theology at Rome, and was elected general of his order in 1571; was made nominal archbishop of Casarea about 1586, and exercised the episcopal functions in the diocese of Sens, in the absence of the regular incumbent. Cheffontaines was therefore accused of having preached without due authority, and went to Rome to justify himself. In the space of five years he applied successively to five popes, Sixtus V, Urban VII, Gregory XIV, Innocent IX, and Clement VIII, and finally received letters from the pontiff which imposed silence on his enemies. He died in Rome, May 26, 1595, leaving, La Défense de la Foi de nos Ancêtres (Paris, 1570); translated by the author under the title of Fides Majorum Nostrorum Defensio, etc. (Antwerp, 1575; Venice, 1581, 8vo):—La Présence Réelle (Paris, 1571, 1586, 8vo):—Réponse Familiale à une Epître Ecrite contre le Livre Arbitre et le Mérite des Bonnes Œuvres, etc. (ibid. 1571, 8vo); translated into Latin by the author, under the title of Consultatio Epistolæ Cujusdam contra Liberum Arbitrium et Merita (Antwerp, 1576, 8vo):—Chrétienne Confutation du Point d'Honneur, etc. (Paris, 1568, 1571, 1579, 8vo), and some other works, including Varii Tractatus et Disputationes (ibid. 1586, 8vo), the first part of which was entered in the Index. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Cheimazomeni (χειμαζόμενοι, exposed to the winter; i. e. tempest-tossed), a name given by Greek writers to dæmoniaca, or energumens, possessed with an evil spirit. Some, however, consider the term to apply to such penitents as, from the heinousness of their crimes, were not only expelled from the communion, but cast out of the very court of the church, and put to do penance in the open air, exposed to the inclemency of the weather.

Cheirromancy (from χείρ, the hand, and μαρτεία, divination) is divining future events in the life of an individual from the appearance of the hand. See PALMISTRY.

Cheirosemantra (from χείρ, the hand, and σημαίνω, to indicate) is the wooden board which is struck by a mallet, in Oriental Greek churches, to summon the people to service. This is the usual call to worship for all classes in the East, in consequence of the prohibition of bells by the Turks, who imagine that their sound drives away the good spirits.

Cheirothesia (from χείρ, the hand, and τίθημι, to put, or place) is a word used in the Greek New Test. to indicate ordination, or the laying on of hands. Episcopalians attach great importance to the cheirothesia in the ordination of office-bearers. See ORDINATION.

Cheirotonia (from χείρ, the hand, and τείνω, to stretch out) is a word used in the Greek New Test. to indicate the election of church-officers, because one method of voting for them was by holding up or stretching out the hands. See ORDINATION.

Cheisholme. See CHISHOLM.

Cheisholme, Alexander, a Scotch clergyman, probably a son of Alexander, an early minister at Comrie, was appointed the second Protestant minister at Muthil in 1576; lived with his aged mother-in-law till 1583; was transferred to Comrie before 1585, at which place he was the first minister of the Protestant faith, and had three other parishes in charge. He was transferred to Lecroft before 1588, to which parish he was the first Protestant clergyman, and was deposed in May, 1592, not having the gift of exhortation nor application, although he had fifteen days given him to expound a text. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 732, 752, 779.

Cheisholme, Archibald, A.M., a Scotch clergyman of Dumblane, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1653; was called to the living at Newbattle in 1663, and ordained; transferred to Corstorphine in 1666, and died in 1670, aged about thirty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 137, 295.

Cheisholme, Gilbert, a Scotch clergyman, a member of the convent of the Cistercian monastery at Deer, adopted the principles of the reformation, and was appointed the first Protestant minister at Deer, in 1567, having three other parishes in charge. He was presented to the parsonage at Lunney by the king in 1569, and to the parsonage and vicarage of Rathin the same year. In 1574 his charge was reduced to three parishes, and in 1576 to two only. He continued in 1585. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 619.

Chel. See TEMPLE.

Chelozizky, Peter, one of the most important writers of the Hussite period, who died about 1460. is known by his writings, in which he advocated the free exercise of religion. He rejected every civic as well as ecclesiastical authority, and denounced war and capital punishment as in opposition to true Christianity. After the defeat of the Taborites his doctrines found many adherents, and formed, in 1453, the basis of the Kunwader Union, from which resulted the Bohemian Brethren. See F. Schulz, Peter Chelcicky (Prague, 1882); Goll, Quellen und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der Böhmischen Brüder; Peter Chelcizky und seine Lehre (ibid. eod.). (B. P.)

Cheliânus, a presbyter of Llandaff, succeeded St. Samson as archbishop of Dol, in the time of king Arthur, according to Geoffrey of Monmouth (ix, 15, ed. Giles).—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Chelidonia, in Greek mythology, was a festival of boys, on the island of Rhodes. They went from house to house and begged a gift in the name of the swallow (χελιδών), singing a song about her return, which tells of the coming of spring.

Chelidonius and Hæmaterius, brothers and soldiers, were martyred at the Gascon town of Calagurris (Calahorra, in Castile). The date of their martyrdom is wholly uncertain. They are honored with a hymn by Prudentius, περι σφεδάνων, which is quoted by Gregory of Tours (Glor. Mart. p. 93). The day of the martyrdom of the saints is March 8, according to Gregory.

Chelles, JEAN DE, a French architect, or rather master-mason, flourished about 1250. He erected, among other fine structures, the south entrance of the celebrated church of Notre Dame at Paris. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chelsum, JAMES, D.D., a learned English divine, was born in 1740, in Westminster, and educated at Westminster school, whence he went to St. John's College, Cambridge. Subsequently he received a studentship in Christ Church College, and resided there many years. He took orders in 1762, and was presented to the college curacy of Lathbury, near Newport-Pagnel, and to the benefice of Badger, in Shropshire, by Isaac Hawkins Browne. He was also presented to the rectory of Droxford, in Hampshire, by Dr. North, bishop of Winchester, whose chaplain he was. He died in 1801, leaving an able series of Remarks on Gibbon's Roman History (1772, 8vo; 1878, much enlarged). He is supposed to have had a share in the collection of papers published at Oxford under the title of Olla Podrida, and to have published an Essay on the History of Mezzotinto. He also made a valuable collection of prints and gems, and published some Sermons. See Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Chemiln, in the mythology of Central America, especially among the Caribbeans, is the great spirit who made heaven and earth. He is elevated above all temporal concerns. Evil deeds offend him as little as good deeds make him glad. Neglecting everything subordinate, he lives in the enjoyment of his own blessedness. The Caribbeans do not worship him by any cultus; they only think of him in their hearts, because he does not need their offerings. The same name is borne by the good spirits that conduct the women to heaven.

Chemin, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French theologian, pastor of Torneville, in the diocese of Evreux, was born Nov. 26, 1725, and died March 15, 1781, leaving Vie de Saint-Mauze et de Saint-Vénérand, Martyrs (Evreux, 1752, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cheminais (de Montaigne), TIMOLÉON, a celebrated French preacher, was born at Paris, Jan. 3, 1652. In 1667 he entered the society of the Jesuits, afterwards taught classical literature and rhetoric at Orleans, and became one of the most popular pulpit orators of his time in Paris. He died Sept. 15, 1689, leaving, Sentiments de Piété (Paris, 1691, 1734, 1736, 12mo). His Sermons were published by Bretonneau, another preacher of note (ibid. 1690, 2 vols. 12mo, and often since). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chemnitz, CHRISTIAN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Königsfeld, Jan. 17, 1615. He studied at Leipsic and Jena, and died while professor of theology, June 3, 1666, leaving, Brevia Instructio Futuri Ministri Ecclesiæ:—Dissertatio de Prædestinatione:—Collegium Theologicum in Epist. ad Galatas:—Collegium Theologicum super Formulam Concordiæ, etc. See Freheri Theatrum Eruditorum; Witte, Memoria Theologorum; Zeumer, Vita Professorum Jenensium; Jöcher, Algemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Chenalôpex was a species of goose worshipped as sacred at Thebes, in Egypt.

Chene, Helrome (or Thomas Jeromy), a Scotch clergyman, was the first Protestant minister at Tingwall, appointed in 1567, having one third of the benefice for his stipend. He resigned in favor of his son in 1572, but continued in 1580, and died in 1584. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 429.

Chene, Thomas, a Scotch clergyman, was presented by the king to the living at Tingwall, in 1572, in succession to his father. In 1574 he had five other places in charge, with a stipend of £80. The collation was confirmed by the king in 1584. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 429.

Chenevière, JEAN JACQUES CATON, a Swiss Protestant theologian, was born in 1733. He was professor of theology at Geneva from 1817 to 1865, and died Feb. 5, 1871, leaving, Lettres sur l'Etat Actuel de l'Eglise de Genève (1817):—Causes qui Retardent chez les Réformés les Progrès de la Théologie (1819):—Essais Théologiques (1831-34):—De la Divine Autorité des Écrivains et des Héros du Nouveau Testament (1850). After the English translation of Michaelis's Introduction, he published L'Introduction au Nouveau Testament (1822, 4 vols.). His sermons, delivered at Geneva from 1822 to 1846, were published in 1855. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 433, 812; Zuchold, Bibl. Theolog. i, 221. (B. P.)

Chenewai, in Oriental mythology, is the name of the bridge over the gulf which separates, according to Zoroaster's teaching, the realm of light from that of darkness. The spirits of the dead are obliged to confess their sins upon this bridge, and according as these are pardonable or otherwise, they are admitted to the realm of light or hurled into the yawning gulf. It is said there is a place in Thibet, near the spring of Brahmaputra, showing what this doctrine is designed to express. The pilgrims to this sacred place are transported across an abyss on a scale. Suspended in mid-air, they are obliged to confess their sins to the bonzes. Any hesitancy, even the slightest stammering, may cause the bonzes to remove the balance, and the unfortunate one is hurled into the depth below. See SIRATH.

Chenewolf. See CYNEWULF.

Cheney, George N., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Canandaigua, N. Y., and was rector of Trinity parish, Rochester, about ten years. His ordination to the diaconate occurred in 1852, and to the priesthood in the following year. He died at Branchport, June 12, 1863, aged thirty-six years. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. Oct. 1863, p. 506.

Cheney, James, an English Congregational minister, was born at Guildford, Surrey, Nov. 9, 1805. He openly professed Christianity in his twentieth year, was for years teacher, then superintendent, in the Sunday-school of a neighboring village, and having made trial of his speaking abilities, he finally became regular preacher at Shamly Green. He afterwards attended the Cotton End Training Institution, and then proceeded as agent of the Home Missionary Society to Broad Winsor and Waytown, in Dorsetshire, where he labored fourteen years. His next removal was to the Isle of Portland, where he died, Nov. 20, 1863. Mr. Cheney was a faithful and earnest minister, untiring in his efforts for the good of his people, and especially of great service to the poor in times of sickness. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1864, p. 201.

Cheney, Joseph, a Congregational minister, was born at Holden, Mass., Aug. 16, 1775, and graduated from Brown University in 1801. He studied theology with Rev. Dr. Emmons, and after preaching in several places as a temporary supply, commenced his labors as pastor in Milton, Vt., Sept. 15, 1807, where he remained ten years. His next settlement was in Salisbury, his ministry commencing in March, 1819, and ending in 1823, in consequence of injuries received from being thrown from his horse. He died June 6, 1833. "As regards his knowledge of theology, he stood high among his brethren. As a preacher, he was clear, earnest, and faithful." See Hist. of Mendon Association, p. 277. (J. C. S.)

Cheney, Laban Clark, a Methodist, and afterwards a Presbyterian, minister, was born at Rowe, Berkshire Co., Mass., March 20, 1808. At an early age he joined the Methodist Church, and became a pupil in Wilbraham Academy, where he made rapid progress in study. In his twenty-first year he was licensed, and entered the New York East Conference, in which he labored until 1860, when he joined the Presbyterian Church, and became pastor at Kenton, O. He died in 1864. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 81.

Cheney, Martin, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Dover, Mass., Aug. 29, 1792. He early developed a remarkable thirst for knowledge, was converted in June, 1821, and having joined the Free-will Baptists, was set apart to the work of the ministry by the Union Conference, in April, 1825. He commenced his public labors in Olneyville, in the neighborhood of Providence, R. I., where, after a long period of eminent success, he died, Jan. 3, 1852. Mr. Cheney was well known and highly esteemed in his own denomination, while his Christian and catholic spirit endeared him to other circles. See Day, Memoirs; Barrett, Memoirs of Eminent Preachers, p. 125-132.

Cheney, Rufus, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born May 4, 1780. He began his labors in Scioto County, O., preaching for a number of years in that state, and then removed to Wisconsin, where he planted the first church of his denomination. He died Aug. 31, 1869. "For more than half a century he freely preached a free gospel, and practiced what he preached." See Morning Star, Dec. 22, 1880. (J. C. S.)

Cheney, Samuel Willard, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Milton, Vt., Dec. 2, 1816. He prepared for college at the Scientific Institute of Brandon; graduated at Middlebury College in 1840; entered Princeton Seminary in the fall of 1843, but, before completing his course, became a private tutor in Kentucky; afterwards returned to Princeton Seminary; spent some time there and went again to Kentucky, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Transylvania, April 9, 1845. He was ordained and installed pastor of a church in Springfield, the same year, and continued to labor there nine years; next spent a year in Winchester, and then was installed pastor of Mulberry Church, Shelby County, in 1856. In 1861 he accepted a call to Winchester, where, in addition to his pastoral labors, he had charge of a large and flourishing school for young ladies till 1870. Two years later he went to Missouri, and took charge of a young ladies' school at Clinton, and while there had a connection with the Lafayette Presbytery. He next went to Sardis, Miss.; engaged both in teaching and preaching; was installed pastor there in 1873; also supplied the Church at Coldwater till his death at Sardis, May 8, 1876. Mr. Cheney's knowledge was extensive and varied. His preaching was pure, logical, simple, and earnest. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1878, p. 54.

Cheney, Thomas, a Congregational minister, was born at Roxbury, Mass. He graduated from Harvard College in 1711, was ordained pastor at Brookfield, Oct. 16, 1717, and died Dec. 11, 1747, aged fifty-seven years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 173.

Chenowith, Alfred Griffith, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Winchester, Va., Feb. 9, 1809. He was converted at the age of twenty; after studying four years received license to preach; and in 1834 was admitted into the Baltimore Conference, in which he labored with zeal and fidelity until 1855, when he was transferred to the North-west Indiana Conference. In it he continued his diligent and faithful service until his sudden death, April 25, 1864. Mr. Chenowith was affable and companionable as a man; a model of simplicity, faith, and purity as a Christian; sound in theology, and untiring in energy and labor as a minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 148.

Chenowith, George D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born Aug. 3, 1811, in Berkeley County, West Virginia. He received a common-school education, spending some time at Mount Hope Seminary. He was converted at a camp-meeting; in 1832 was licensed, and in 1833 joined the Baltimore Conference on trial, in which he labored thirty-five years, filling many of the best appointments in the conference, and serving four years as presiding elder. He became a supernumerary in 1868, on account of failing health, and in 1870 received a government appointment, which he held until his sudden death in Washington, D. C., May 18, 1880. He was a sound theologian and a useful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 76.

Chenu, Pierre, a French engraver, was born at Paris in 1718 (or 1730), and studied under Le Bas. He died about 1780. The following are his principal plates: The Adoration of the Shepherds; Christ Driving the Money-changers from the Temple; The Ancient Temple at Ephesus. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cherchemont, Jean de, a French prelate, nephew of another of the same name, was born in the beginning of the 14th century. He was appointed to the bishopric of Troyes, then transferred to Amiens, and finally became chancellor of France under Philippe de Valois. He died Jan. 26, 1373. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chéreau, François, a French engraver, was born at Blois in 1680, studied under Pierre Duret and Gerard Audran, was admitted to the French Academy in 1718, became engraver to the king, and died at Paris April 15, 1729. Among his numerous works, two of the best are, St. John in the Desert, after Raphael; and St. Cecilia, after Mignard. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Chéreau, Jacques, a French engraver, brother and scholar of the foregoing, was born at Blois in 1694. The following are his principal religious works: The Holy Family; The Virgin with the Infant Jesus and St. John; David with the Head of Goliath, Christ

Washing the Feet of the Apostles; The Descent from the Cross. He died at Paris in 1759. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chereltu, in Lamaism, is the strong, inaccessible fort, built in a rocky chasm of the mountain Summer Alu by the spirit Erkitu Rachu, one of the four rulers of the evil demons (assurs). It is not to be reached, on account of its depth, by the spirit of light, and the evil spirit uses it as a good position from which to make his attacks upon the virtuous spirits.

Cheriet, Hubert, a French martyr, was a native of Dijon, whom neither the terrors of death nor the entreaties of his parents could persuade to renounce the truth of the Gospel. He was burned at Dijon in 1549. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 405.

Cherith, Brook of. No better modern locality for this has yet been found than Wady Kelt, a ravine which empties into the Jordan plain opposite Jericho. It is thus described by Lieutenant Conder (Tent-Work, ii, 21):

"Wady Kelt has been thought to be the Brook Cherith, and the scene seems well fitted for the retreat of the prophet who was fed by the Oreb, whom some suppose to have been Arabs. The whole gorge is wonderfully wild and romantic; it is a deep fissure rent in the mountains, scarcely twenty yards across at the bottom, and full of caues and rank rushes between vertical walls of rock. In its cliffs the caves of early anchorites are hollowed, and the little monastery of St. John of Choseboth is perched above the north bank, under a high, brown precipice. A fine aqueduct from the great spring divides at this latter place into three channels, crossing a magnificent bridge seventy feet high, and running a total distance of three miles and three quarters, to the place where the gorge debouches into the Jericho plain. On each side the white chalk mountains tower up in fantastic peaks, with long, knife-edged ridges, and hundreds of little conical points, with deep torrent-seams between. All is bare and treeless, as at Mar Saba. The wild pigeon makes its nest in the 'secret places of the stairs' of rock: the black grackle suns its golden wings above them; the eagle soars grapple still, and over the caves by the deep pools the African kluftfisher flutters; the ibex also still haunts the rocks. Even in autumn the murmuring of water is heard beneath, and the stream was one day swelled by a thunderstorm, in a quarter of an hour, until it became a raging torrent, in some places eight or ten feet deep.

"The mouth of the pass is also remarkable; for on either side is a conical peak of white chalk—one on the south, called the 'peak of the ascent' (Tuweil el 'Akabeh), while that to the north is named Bint Jebel, 'daughter of the little mountain,' or Nush 'Aweishreh, 'monument of the tribes.'

"These peaks are again, to all appearance, connected with a Christian tradition. Jerome speaks of Gebal and Gerizim as two mountains close together, shown in his day just west of Jericho. In the name Jebel we may perhaps recognise the Gebal of this tradition; and in that case the 'monument of the tribes' would be the traditional altar of Joshua in Ebal. If this be so, the southern peak must be the early Christian Gerizim; but the name is apparently lost." (See engraving on opposite page.)

Cherokee Version of the Scriptures. The Cherokee is vernacular to the Cherokee Indians. The first portion of the Scriptures printed in this language was the Gospel of Matthew (without date), a second edition of which appeared in 1832, and a third in 1840. All three editions were published at the Arkansas mission press, Park Hill, at the expense of the A. B. C. F. M. In 1833 the same society published the Acts at New Echota, being the translation of the Rev. Samuel Worcester, in concert with Elias Boudinot, an educated Cherokee. The Gospel of John, prepared by the same translators was published in 1838, and reprinted in 1840 and 1841. Since 1869 the entire New Test. and portions of the Old have been published by the American Bible Society. See Bible of Every Land, p. 459 sq. (B. P.)

Chéron, Élisabeth Sophie, a French painter, was born at Paris, Oct. 3, 1648, and learned the elements of design from her father, Henri, a Parisian miniature-painter. The following are her most important works: The Descent from the Cross; St. Cecilia; a Magdalen;

Gorge of Wady Kelt, looking down towards the Jordan Plain.

St. Austin; St. John; and St. Paul, after Raphael. In 1676 Le Brun proposed her as a candidate for the honors of the academy, and she was received with marks of distinction. She died at Paris, Sept. 3, 1711. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Chéron, Louis, a Parisian painter, brother of the foregoing, was born at Paris in 1660, where he first studied, and afterwards visited Italy. On returning to Paris he was employed to paint two pictures for the Church of Notre Dame, representing The Decollation of John the Baptist, and The Prophet Agabus. Being a Calvinist, he was compelled to leave France, and went to England, where he executed a number of works, among them, Peter Curing the Lame Man at the Gate of the Temple; The Baptism of the Eunuch by Philip; and twenty-three subjects for the Psalms of David. He died at London in 1723. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cherrington, David H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Monroe County, Va., April 2, 1830. He joined the Church in his tenth year, and entered the Ohio Conference in 1853. His health failing, he was put on the superannuated list in 1865, when he retired to the home of his youth, and there slowly declined till his decease, Dec. 26, 1866. Mr. Cherrington was a remarkably genial, pleasant, sweet-spirited man. He was true to his convictions, and unwavering in his fidelity to the Church. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 259.

Cherry, Thomas, a preacher of the United Methodist Free Church, was born at Swaledale, Yorkshire, July 12, 1831. His parents were Congregationalists; his father died when he was a child, and he began work early in life, with but little education. He was converted at nineteen, in a Methodist chapel, joined the Wesleyans, became a local preacher, in 1862 entered the ministry of the Methodist Free Church, and for thirteen years devoted himself to preaching the Gospel. In 1875 he became a supernumerary, and died April 24, 1876, at Mansfield. See Minutes of the 20th Ann. Assembly.

Cherry, William, an English Baptist minister, son of Rev. John Cherry, of Wellington, Somerset, was born in 1796. He was converted in his youth, and soon began to preach with acceptance; was appointed a Baptist home missionary, first in Warwickshire, then at West Haddon, and finally settled as pastor of the Baptist Church at Milton, Oxford, where he labored for seventeen years successfully. His health failing, in 1861 he became a deacon, and died, much esteemed and beloved, Dec. 9, 1866. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1868, p. 120.

Chersais, in Greek mythology, was one of the three sisters called Grææ (q. v.), daughters of Phorcy and Ceto. They had only one tooth and one eye in common.

Chersonesus, THE MARTYRS OF, A.D. 296, are commemorated March 7 in the Byzantine Calendar.

Cherubic Hymn, THE, so called from the reference to the cherubim contained in it, occurs in the chief Eastern liturgies shortly after the dismissal of the catechumens, and immediately preceding the "great entrance" (i. e. that of the elements). It is found in the same position in the liturgies of St. James, St. Basil, St. Chrysostom, and St. Mark. Its object is described as being to excite the minds of the faithful to a devout attention to the mysteries about to be celebrated. While it is sung, the priest says secretly a prayer called "the prayer of the cherubic hymn." See TRI-SAGION.

Cherubini DI MORIENNA, an Italian monk, born about the middle of the 16th century, entered the Capuchin order, labored for the conversion of the Calvinists of Chablais, and died at Turin in 1606, leaving Acta Disputationis Habita cum Quodam Ministro Hæretico (1593). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cherubini SANDOLINI, an Italian Capuchin of Udina, who lived in the 16th century, wrote a work on dialling, entitled, Taulemma, etc. (Venice, 1598, 4 vols.). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chesnut, BENJAMIN, a Presbyterian minister, was born in England, came to America, and graduated at Nassau Hall in 1748. He was licensed by the New York Presbytery, transferred to the Presbytery of New Brunswick, Oct. 3, 1749, and ordained pastor at Woodbury, Sept. 3, 1751. He supplied Mr. Lawrence's pulpit at Cape May during a short absence of the pastor; was dismissed from the charge at Woodbury at his own request in 1753, and settled at New Providence in 1756. In 1763 he was dismissed by the Philadelphia Presbytery, went south in 1765, and in 1767 was sent to Timber Creek, N. J. After this he taught school near Philadelphia, and died in 1775. See Index to Princeton Rev. (W. P. S.)

Chesné, ROBERT, a French preacher, of the time of the League, declared himself the enemy of Henry IV, after the death of Henry III. His order sent him as protector of the Franciscan monks to Vendôme, during the siege of that city. On its capture by assault, in November, 1589, Chesné was taken prisoner, in the choir of St. Martin, and hanged instantly, without resistance, by the soldiers of the duke of Biron. The Franciscans regard him as a saint and martyr. In 1789 a representation of his head still adorned the gallery of the organ in the church where he was murdered. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cheshire, JOHN E., a Baptist minister, was born in England in 1821. He was converted in early life, and joined a Church in Birmingham. He was licensed to preach when quite a young man, came to America about 1845, and went to Mexico, where, during the war, he acted for a time as the interpreter of General Scott. He returned to the United States, and became pastor at Lyons Farms, N. J., and afterwards at Keeseville, Waterford, and Amsterdam, N. Y.; the Falls of the Schuylkill, near Philadelphia; Montrose, Pa.; Mansfield, O.; and finally Bridgeton, N. J. He died June 17, 1881. See N. Y. Examiner, Jan. 30, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Chest. Among our English ancestors chests appear to have been very important pieces of furniture, serving as receptacles for every kind of goods that required to be kept with any degree of care; they were also placed in churches for keeping the holy vessels, vestments, etc. See CHESTERS.

Church Chest at Graveney, Kent, cir. 1290.

Chester, Alfred, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Hartford, Conn., March 17, 1798. He graduated at Yale College in 1818, spent one year at Andover Theological Seminary, and the two succeeding years at Princeton Theological Seminary. After three years' service as a home missionary in South Carolina, he was ordained over the Presbyterian Church at Rahway, N. J., in July, 1826. He left his charge in 1829; for the next fourteen years was the principal of a classical school in Morristown, and agent of the Presbyterian Board of Publication until about 1858. During the latter part of his life he resided in Elizabeth, and for the last nine years was chaplain of the county prison there. He died in New York city, July 2, 1871. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1871.

Chester, Charles Huntington, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Norwich, Conn., Oct. 14, 1816. He never entered any college, but studied privately under his brother, the Rev. Albert T. Chester, D.D., and afterwards taught at Ballston Spa, N. Y. In the autumn of 1839 he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, but did not graduate. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Albany, Oct. 21, 1840, as stated supply to the Church of Greenfield; and was ordained Oct. 13, 1842, still continuing at Greenfield until May, 1844, when he became pastor of the Dutch Reformed Church at Schuylerville. He accepted the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church at Niagara Falls in November, 1850; next at Oaks Corners, Ontario Co.; then at Shortsville, as a missionary employed by the American Home Missionary Society, until 1857, and was agent for the Presbyterian Publication Committee until 1861. From November, 1861, he supplied the Church at Havana, N. Y., and from April, 1868, likewise that at Dresden, continuing at both until December, 1871. He died suddenly at Geneva, April 4, 1878. He was a devoted Christian, whose religious life ran in deep channels. He was a firm believer in the doctrines of grace. As a preacher, he was clear, condensed, quiet, earnest, sometimes thrilling. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1878, p. 45.

Chester, George, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Grinshill, Shropshire, England, May 2, 1829. He was converted when about sixteen; emigrated to America in 1849; and in 1851 entered the Wisconsin Conference, wherein he served the Church until his decease, Sept. 24, 1865. Mr. Chester, though not a brilliant, was yet a faithful and useful preacher. He was careful and energetic in all his domestic and ministerial duties. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 235.

Chester, Henry, an English Congregational minister, was born at Bristol, May 23, 1816. He was converted at the age of sixteen; joined the Wesleyan Methodists, and, being fervent in spirit and active in disposition, soon became very prominent in the Sabbath-school, "class," and prayer meetings, and as preacher in the courts and alleys of the city, as well as the villages around. Later he united with the Independents, was ordained at Salisbury, and afterwards preached at Stourbridge and afterwards at Cardiff, where he died, Feb. 28, 1873. Mr. Chester's life was unspotted, and his piety manifest to all. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 318.

Chester, John (1), an English Independent, was minister at Wetherly, Leicestershire, some years; was violently dispossessed after 1660; came to London and preached in Christ-Church till ejected, in 1662. He ministered for some years at the Independent Church, Union Street; went up with the address to the king in 1687, and died at Guildford, Surrey, in May, 1696. Dr. Calamy says, "He lived desired, and died lamented." See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 198-195.

Chester, John (2), D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Wethersfield, Conn., in August, 1783. He graduated from Yale College in 1804. In 1807 he was licensed to preach by the Association of Hartford. After preaching for a short time successively at Marblehead and Springfield, Mass., and receiving calls to settle in Middletown, Conn., and Cooperstown, N. Y., he was installed pastor in Hudson, N. Y., Nov. 21, 1810, and in Albany in 1815. In 1828 he became pastor of a new Presbyterian Church in the last-named place. He died in Philadelphia, Jan. 12, 1829. As a preacher he was earnest and interesting. Dr. Chester published the following works: A Sermon before the Columbia Missionary Society (1813):—A Sermon before the Albany Moral Society (1821):—A Biographical Sketch of the Rev. Azel Buckus, D.D. He was a frequent contributor to the Columbian Magazine. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 401.

Chester, William, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Wetherfield, Conn., Nov. 20, 1795. He graduated from Union College in 1813, and studied at the Theological Seminary at Princeton until 1817. He was licensed by the Albany Presbytery in 1818, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Galway, N. Y. In 1822 he was called to a church in Hudson, where he remained till 1832, at which time he was selected to canvass the states of Virginia and North Carolina in the interests of the Presbyterian Board of Publication. After his election to membership in the board, he held various important offices in it until his death, in Washington, D. C., May 23, 1865. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 98; Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem., p. 22.

Chestnut, Thomas M., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington County, Pa.; graduated from Washington College; was ordained by the Presbytery of Steubenville in 1834; preached the Gospel for many years in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, and died at Perryville, O., March 6, 1872, aged sixty-nine years. He was a laborious and faithful minister. See Presbyterian, March 23, 1872.

Chests for the COPE or VESTMENT. These were of triangular shape, such as remain at Gloucester, York, Salisbury, and Westminster. In the 13th century the synod of Exeter required a chest for books and vestments in every parish. Such parish chests of Early English date remain at Clymping, Stoke d'Abernion, Saltwood, and Graveney; of Decorated date at Brancepeth, Huttoft, and Hacomby; and of the Perpendicular period at St. Michael's, Coventry, St. Mary's, Cambridge, and Oxford Cathedral. A "Flanders chest" remains at Guestling. Some very rude coffers, bound with iron, are preserved in some churches, and others are enriched with color; these are probably of late date. The material was often cypress or fir. Others are curiously painted, like one in the vestry of Lambeth Palace. Several Early English chests are preserved in the triforium of Westminster Abbey; one is at Salisbury, and another was removed from the Pyx Chapel to the Record Office. See CHEST.

Chettle, Henry Hurlbert, a Wesleyan minister, son of Rev. John Chettle, and grandson of Rev. Simon Day, was born at Burton-upon-Trent, March 5, 1809. For six years studied at Kingswood School, and afterwards became a master in Woodhouse Grove. In 1832 he received his first charge (Pickering); in 1852 was elected secretary of the Worn-Out Ministers and Ministers' Widows' Auxiliary Fund, and ably served the interests of this department for the rest of his life. After having been eight years governor of Woodhouse Grove School, he retired in 1876 and settled at Easterbrook, Bradford, where he died, June 19, 1878. "Chettle was eminently a good man. His ministry was able, instructive, evangelical, tender. He had the gift of government, was quick in perception, just in judgment, firm in action, administered discipline with wisdom, charity, and success, and greatly served the connection both in peaceful and troublesome times." Mr. Chettle published an address, delivered at Woodhouse Grove, on

The Wise Son (1849), and also fugitive Sermons (1850, 1851, 1857, 1863). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1878, p. 46; Osborne, Wesleyan Bibliography.

Chettle, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Donington Castle in 1777. He was piously trained, and at the age of thirteen was converted; entered the ministry in 1797, and travelled twenty-eight different circuits. He became a supernumerary in 1847, and died Aug. 8, 1850. Mr. Chettle was a plain, practical, and faithful minister, and shared in the success as well as in the persecutions and obloquy of the rising cause. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1850.

Chetwood, KNIGHTLY, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1652, and was educated at Eton. He was made fellow of King's College, Cambridge, in 1683, when he contributed the Life of Lycurgus to the translation of Plutarch's Lives, published in the same year. In April, 1707, he was installed dean of Gloucester, which preferment he enjoyed until his death at Tempsford, in Bedfordshire, April 11, 1720. Dr. Chetwood wrote the Life of Virgil, and the Preface to the Pastorals, prefixed to Dryden's Virgil. He was author also of several poems, some of which are preserved in Dryden's Miscellany, and in Mr. Nichol's collection.

Chetwynd, JOHN, an English clergyman, was born at Banwell, Somersetshire, in 1623, and admitted commoner of Exeter College, Oxford, in 1638, where he took his master's degree in 1648. He was one of the joint pastors of St. Cuthbert, in Wells, afterwards became vicar of the Temple, in Bristol, one of the city lecturers, and a prebendary of the cathedral. He died Dec. 30, 1692. Besides some Sermons, he published a curious book, entitled Anthologia Historica, containing fourteen centuries of memorable occurrences, etc. (Lond. 1674, 8vo).

Cheulf, bishop, attests a charter of Offa, king of Mercia, A.D. 777, thought to be doubtful or spurious.

Chause, NICOLAS DU, a French martyr, was going from Besançon to the town of Gry, but did not do homage to a cross in the way, for which a passing monk, who was an inquisitor, suspected him. Being guided by this monk to Gry, he was there condemned. When carried to the place of martyrdom, he was offered his liberty on condition of kneeling down and hearing a mass. But Nicolas preferred to die rather than commit such an act; and, calling upon the Lord, took his death patiently. He was burned in 1554. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 424.

Chevalier, Antoine Rudolphe, a French theologian, was born in 1507, at Montchamps, Normandy. He was professor of Hebrew at Strasburg, Geneva, and Caen. In 1568 he had to leave the latter place on account of religious persecution, and went to England, where he became professor at Cambridge. In 1570 he returned to Caen, but was obliged in 1572 to leave it again, and went to the isle of Guernsey, where he died the same year. He is the author of Rudimenta Hebr. Ling. Accurata Methodo Conscripta (Geneva, 1560, a. o.). See Fittst, Bibl. Jud. i, 151; Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Handbuch, p. 34; *Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Biblioth. Chevalier, Nicholas Washington, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Middletown, Conn., Sept. 20, 1809. He graduated from New Jersey College in 1834, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1837. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Lexington, Ky., Oct. 19, 1839, as pastor at Christiansburg, Va., until 1856; was principal of a female seminary at Holly Springs, Miss., until 1858, and stated supply and missionary at Gonzales, Tex., from 1859 until his death, Sept. 6, 1868. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 98.

Chevalier, Paul, a Dutch theologian, was professor of theology and Church history at the University of Groningen, where he delivered six discourses on the fundamental truths of morality, 1770. He died March 7, 1796. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chevanes, Jacques, a French monk, was born at Autun about 1608. He entered the Capuchin order, devoted himself to preaching, and died in 1678, leaving Les Entrétiens Curieux d'Hermodore et d'un Voyageur Inconnu (Lyons, 1634, 4to);—Conduite des Illustres (Paris, 1657, 12mo);—Harangue Funèbre de Louis-Gaston-Charles (Dijon, 1658, 4to), and some other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chevassu, Joseph, a French theologian, was born at St.-Claude, in Franche-Comté, Nov. 6, 1674. After his appointment to the parish church of Les Rousses, in the diocese of St.-Claude, he published anonymously the following works: Cathéchisme Paroissial (Lyons, 1726, 12mo);—Méditations Ecclésiastiques (ibid. 1737, 4 vols. 12mo);—Méditations Chréliennes (ibid. 1746, 12mo);—Méditations sur la Passion (ibid. eod.);—Abregé du Rituel Romain (ibid. eod.);—Prônes pour tous les Dimanches de l'Année (ibid. 1753);—Méditations sur les Vérités Chrélienne et Ecclésiastiques (ibid. 1751), etc. He died at his native place, Oct. 25, 1752. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chevers, George W., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, at first studied medicine and received his diploma. In 1853 he officiated in Crompton, R. I., and remained there until about 1856, and subsequently officiated in Portsmouth, in the same state, becoming rector of St. Paul's Church there in 1859, and retaining the position until his death, in October, 1867. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1868, p. 104.

Chevers, John M., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was ordained deacon in 1852, and priest two years thereafter. During the last three years of his life he had charge of Hungar's Parish, Va. He died at Holly Grove, in the same state, Sept. 27, 1857, aged twenty-six years. See Amer. Quar. Church Review, 1858, p. 612.

Chevers, Mark L., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Virginia, for a number of years was a chaplain of the United States army at Old Point Comfort, Va., and was also rector of Centurion Church in the same place. In 1867, although still holding the pastorate of Centurion Church, his services as chaplain were transferred to Fortress Monroe. He continued to hold these offices until his death, Sept. 13, 1875, at the age of eighty years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 150.

Cheverton, Henry Young, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Winchester, Sept. 12, 1786. He was converted in 1798; received into the ministry in 1807, having been under the tutorship of Rev. Daniel Taylor, one of the founders of the General Baptists; retired in 1849; settled in Bath, and finally in London, where he died, Jan. 16, 1871. For high-souled honor, Cheverton had few equals. His religious life flowed smoothly. He was very modest, and diligent as a student. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1871, p. 19; West. Meth. Magazine, 1872, p. 481.

Cheverus, Jean Louis Anne Madeleine Lefebvre, a Roman Catholic dignitary, was born at Mayenne, France, Jan. 28, 1768. He entered the priesthood in Paris, in 1790; came to the United States, labored among the Indians and scattered Catholics of New England; was consecrated in Baltimore first bishop of the new see of Boston, Nov. 1, 1810; declined an appointment to the archbishopric of Baltimore; was transferred to the see of Montauban, France, in 1818; was made archbishop of Bordeaux in 1820; cardinal in 1836, and died July 19 of the same year. Bishop Cheverus endeared himself to all by his charities and good works. While in Boston he prepared a prayer-book and a French Testament. See Life of Cardinal Cheverus, by Rev. J. Huen Dubourg, transl. by Robert Walsh (Phila. 1839); according to De Courcy and Shea, the real author of this book is Rev. Mr. Hamon, a Sulpician, as appears from later French editions. See De Courcy and Shea, Hist. of the Cath. Church in the United States, p. 70, 99, 508, 509; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chevet (capitium) is the place corresponding to the position of our Lord's head upon the cross, on the ground-plan of a church, in which the altar represents his head, and the radiating chapels the glory about it. Like the apse, it took its origin from the junction of the circular mortuary chapel with the choir, by the removal of the intermediate walls, in a basilica. The tomb-house has been preserved at Canterbury, St. Drontheim, Batalha, Burgos, and Murcia. The chevet appears at Westminster, Pershore, and Tewkesbury. In France its screen of tall pillars is very striking.

Chevillard, André, a French preacher of the Dominican order, was born at Rennes early in the 17th century, and died in America, May 26, 1682. Having been sent several times as a missionary to the French colonies in this country, he published, in the interval of his missions, Les Desseins de son Eminence de Richelieu pour l'Amérique, etc. (Rennes, 1659, 4to), which asserted the conversion of a large body of Indians, and of 200 heretics who had come over from France. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chevrier, Charles N., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, became assistant minister, about 1864, of St. Michael's Church, Trenton, N. J. In 1865 he officiated in Union Church, Lower Providence, near Shannonsville, Pa., subsequently became rector of Memorial Church, Lower Providence, and in 1868 assumed the rectorship of Trinity Church, Swedesboro, N. J., where he remained until his death, Nov. 13, 1872, at the age of thirty-two years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1875, p. 134.

Chew, Jonas C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Gloucester County, N. J., about 1807. He received a careful religious training; was led to Christ at the age of fourteen; licensed to exhort at twenty-four, to preach at twenty-eight, and at the age of forty received ordination as deacon. His services as local preacher were abundant and successful, and continued till 1856, when he joined the New Jersey Conference. In 1860 his failing health obliged him to become superannuated, and he retired to his farm in Cumberland County, where he died of cholera, Oct. 3, 1866. Mr. Chew was an excellent preacher, and brought many into the Church. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 45.

Chew, Thomas B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Anne Arundel County, Md., Jan. 2, 1823. He was converted in youth, soon after given license to preach, and in 1854 admitted into the Baltimore Conference. During his brief ministry he travelled Calvert, Wardsville, Sweet Spring, and West Falls Circuits with great success. He died in February, 1864. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 16.

Cheyam, John de, a Scotch prelate, was an Englishman by birth, and archdeacon of Bath. He was consecrated by pope Alexander IV, bishop of the see of Glasgow, in 1260, and died in France in 1268. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 240.

Cheyne, Henry, a Scotch prelate, was promoted to the bishopric of Aberdeen in 1281, and was one of those who swore fealty to king Edward I of England, in 1296. He continued bishop of this see for forty-eight years, and died about 1329. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 109.

Cheyne, James, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1666. was clerk to the Presbytery of Deer from 1672 to March, 1683, and schoolmaster at Longside from March, 1680; received the living at Carluke in 1684; was robbed and ousted by the rabble after April, 1688; intruded at Rathen after 1695; was deprived by the Privy Council in August, 1702, and died in August, 1703. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 311; iii, 638.

Cheyne, John, a Scotch clergyman, was admitted to the living at Kinkell prior to November, 1683; continued in June, 1643; and transferred to Kintore. He was taken prisoner with four other ministers, outlanders against the Covenant, in 1640; lodged the marquis of Montrose in his house on March 12, 1645. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 586, 589.

Cheyne, Robert (1), a Scotch clergyman, was admitted to the living at Forbes prior to 1639; was a member of the General Assembly that year; transferred to Kennethmont in 1643; was one of the committee for trial of the professor of divinity, King's College, Aberdeen, the same year; also a member of the Commission of Assembly in 1649; joined the Protestors in 1651, and continued in October, 1675. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 557, 572.

Cheyne, Robert (2), a Scotch clergyman, was minister at Girthon in 1686; deprived in 1690 by the act restoring old Presbyterian ministers, and died Jan. 25, 1735. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 713.

Cheyne, William (1), a Scotch clergyman, was admitted to the living at Tyrie in April, 1615, and deposed in 1637. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 642.

Cheyne, William (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1635; was admitted to the living at Dyce in 1645, and died before Feb. 15, 1676, aged about sixty-one years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 500.

Cheyne, William (3), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1677; was licensed to preach in 1683, and presented to the living at Carmichael in 1685, but died the month after his admission to the benefice. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 314.

Chi-. For words of Greek origin with these initials, see the corresponding titles under CHIE.

Chiacin, in the mythology of Lamaism, was one of the Lahes, or heavenly spirits, who with his brightness so irradiated the body of the mother of Cio Concias, that the latter became wholly transparent and free from all earthly elements.

Chia-Nom-Nangva, in the mythology of Lamaism, is one of the sixteen spaces which encircle the world, and serve as the residences of the Lahes, or heavenly spirits. Here they enjoy everything charming to the senses, such as food, drink, dress, etc. In the four highest spaces they have a less material blessedness.

Chiappe, Battista, an Italian painter, was born at Novi, near Genoa, in 1723; studied at Rome, and afterwards settled at Milan, where he painted a number of pictures for the churches. His best work is in the church of San Ignazio, representing that saint with a glory of angels. He died in 1765, in the midst of a successful career.

Chiappen, an idol of the savages inhabiting the valley of Turnia, near Panama, was their Mars, or god of war. Before setting out to fight they sacrificed slaves and prisoners to honor him, and besmeared the idol with the blood of the victims.

Chiarelli, Benedetto, an Italian theologian, who lived early in the 18th century, wrote: Riflessi Morali (Messina, 1688, 8vo):—Chimica Filosofica (ibid. 1696, 4to):—Panegirici Sacri (ibid. 1701, 4to):—Memorie Sacre Della Città di Messina (ibid. 1705), etc. See Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chiari, Giuseppe, an eminent Roman painter, was born in 1654, and was a scholar of Maratti. He was continually employed on grand works for the churches of the nobility. The principal are the ceiling in Santa Maria di Montesanto, and the Adoration of the Magi, in Santa Maria del Suffragio. He died at Rome in 1727. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chiarini, Louis A., professor and abbé at Paris, was born in Tuscany, April 26, 1789, and died Feb. 28, 1832, professor of Oriental languages at the Warsaw University, leaving Grammatyka Hebrajska (Warsaw, 1826):—Slownik Hebrajski (ibid. 1829):—Théorie du Judaïsme (Paris, 1830, 2 vols.), which elicited rejoinders from Zunz (Berlin, 1830) and from Jost (ibid. eod.):—Fragment d'Astronomie Chaldéenne Decour. dans le Proph. Ezéchiel (Leipzig, 1831):—Le Talmud de Babylone Traduit en Langue Française et Complété par celui de Jérusalem, etc. (ibid. eod. 2 vols.). See First, Bibl. Jud. i, 172 sq.; Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Handbuch, p. 35; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 523. (B. P.)

Chibach, in Slavonic mythology, was one of the evil black deities of the Wends, who represented him as an animal like a dog, encircled by snakes.

Chibbut hak-Keber (חִבּוּט הַקֶּבֶר, the beating of the dead), which, the Jewish rabbis allege, is performed in the grave by the angel Duma and his attendants, who hold in their hands three fiery rods, and judge at once the body and soul. See Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. Talm. s. v.

Chichester, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Cicestrense), provincial, were as follows:

I. Held at Whitsuntide in 1156, concerning the privileges of the Abbey "de Bello," i. e. Battle Abbey, founded by William the Conqueror, who (it was alleged by the abbot, but disputed by the bishop of Chichester) had founded it to be "free and at ease from all claim of servitude, and from all subjection, oppression, and domination of bishops, as is Christ Church, Canterbury." See Labbe, Concil. x, 1176; Wilkins, Concil. i, 428.

II. Held in 1289, under Gilbert, bishop of Chichester. In this council forty-one canons were drawn up.

1 and 2. Recommend to all curates, prayer and reading, humility, continence, and all the evangelical virtues, and forbids them to attend plays, tournaments, indecent shows, and taverns.

4. Sentences those curates who shall seduce their own parishioners to perpetual imprisonment in some monastery, after having first made a penitential pilgrimage during fifteen years.

8. Imposes a fine of sixty shillings, to be applied towards the fabric of the cathedral at Chichester, upon all those who appolot to the care of a parish priests who are notorious fornicators, or who are convicted or suspected of incontinence.

9. Relates to the priestly garments.

10. Orders that well-informed and pious men only be made curates.

15. Orders that the hours be said by the priests at the appointed times, and in such a manner as to minister to edification and true religion.

16. Directs that the priests shall visit the sick on every Sunday and festival, and administer the sacraments to them in their own houses at their own hour. It forbids also (what some had presumed to do) the sending of the eucharist to the rich by the hands of a deacon, while they are themselves indulging in drinking or other carnal pleasures.

19. Declares that neither the viaticum nor burial is to be refused on account of secret crimes.

20. Forbids every curate to receive confession or administer the communion to strange parishioners without the leave of their own curate, or of the pope.

21. Forbids all mention of tithes, or other temporal affairs, during the time of confession.

22. Orders that the communion be administered at Easter, and that no money be taken for so doing.

29. Orders that all churches be provided with suitable vessels, books, and ornaments; and that the font and the chism be kept under lock and key.

33. Directs that the monks shall present to the bishop, those monks whom they desire to appoint to parishes belonging to them.

37 and 38. Relate to marriages.

89. Condemns false preachers, who, without lawful mission, preach and receive confession for the sake of gain.
40 and 41. Excommunicates church plunderers, calumniators, etc.

See Labbe, Concil. xi, 1346; Wilkins, Concil. ii, 169.

III. Held in 1292, by the same prelate; here seven canons were published.

1. Forbids the permitting any animals, except tithe lambs, and those for fifteen days only, to feed in churchyards.

2. Forbids any restraint upon voluntary offerings made by the people to the Church.

3. Excommunicates, ipso facto, those who retain the tithe.

4. Orders silence and decent behavior in church.

5. Forbids indiscriminate burial within the church; the lord of the manor, and the patron, with their wives, the rector, and the curate, are excepted.

6. Forbids the putting up an alms-box in the church without the bishop's permission.

7. Directs that these regulations shall be published four times in each year.

See Labbe, Concilium, xi, 1361; Wilkins, Concilium, ii, 183.

Chichester, Elijah, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Huntington (L. I.), N. Y., about 1778. He was brought up under religious influence and instruction; experienced conversion when about eighteen; received license to preach about four years later, and soon after entered the itinerant ranks of the Troy Conference. Poor support obliged him to locate in 1807 in order to provide for his family. He entered into mercantile business, and thus continued till 1852, when at his request he was readmitted into his conference as a supernumerary, which relation he sustained to the close of his life, Aug. 21, 1855. Mr. Chichester was an excellent man, uncommonly strong in mind and moral integrity, deeply pious, a fine preacher, abundant in labors and usefulness. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1856, p. 52.

Chichester, Isaac, a Presbyterian minister, was born in New Canaan, Conn., in November, 1786. He studied medicine and continued in its practice, mostly in Pembroke, N. Y., till 1832; was licensed by the Genesee Presbytery in 1838, and became pastor at Orangeville, where he labored for twenty-two years. He died at Bennington, Aug. 27, 1864. He was prudent, high-minded, and prompt. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 211.

Chichester, Richard, a monk of the 14th century, was born at Raleigh, in Devonshire; became a monk in Westminster; spent his time in reading Scripture and history; wrote a Chronicle from Hengist the Saxon to 1348, and the Fides Historica, and died in 1355. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 422.

Chichester, Robert, an English prelate of the 12th century, descended from a noble and ancient family in Devonshire, became first dean of Salisbury, then bishop of Exeter in 1128, died in 1150, and was buried on the south side of the altar. He is highly commended by many writers for his piety, though Fuller says it principally consisted in his pilgrimages to Rome, and in building and adorning his cathedral. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), i, 403.

Chichikue (the clapper), is the only musical instrument of the North American Indians. It consists either of a hollow pumpkin or gourd, or of a turtle-shell, filled with stones, so that by shaking it it gives forth a rattling sound. It is used at religious and festive dances.

Chick, John, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Berwick, Me., Dec. 29, 1806. He removed to Ossipee, N. H., in his early youth, became a Christian in 1830, was licensed in 1833, and ordained at a quarterly meeting in East Wolfborough, May 25, 1835. From 1833 to 1873, he was for the most of the time the minister of the Second Free-will Baptist Church in Ossipee. He performed some ministerial work in East Wolf-borough, Effingham Falls, and Wakefield, and frequently visited the churches in his quarterly-meeting district. For the purpose of adding to the strength and prosperity of the Church of which he was the pastor, he interested himself in starting the Ossipee Hosiery, which for a time bade fair to be a successful enterprise. Reversea, however, befell the company, and he sustained heavy losses. He died Jan. 9, 1874. See Morning Star, April 29, 1874. (J. C. S.)

Chickering, Lucius, a Baptist minister, was born at Lunenburg, Vt., Oct. 16, 1815. He pursued his preparatory studies at Brandon, and graduated at Waterville College in 1842. He taught a school in Bethlehem, N. H., for six months afterwards; and began to preach at Meredith in 1843, supplying the pulpit of the Baptist Church there for two years, and for one year that in Haverhill. In 1846 he was ordained over the Church in Thetford, Vt., and in 1851 went to Weston, where he was pastor three years, but returned to his native place, Lunenburg, for five years (1854-59), cultivating a farm for the support of his family, and preaching the Gospel to the destitute churches in his neighborhood. For one year he labored with great zeal as a colporteur in the employ of the American Tract Society, N. Y., in northern Vermont. In October, 1870, he returned to his former church in Weston, with which he labored until he was laid aside by his last sickness. He died there, Sept. 18, 1872. See Obituary Record of Colby University, Supplement, No. i, p. 10. (J. C. S.)

Chicooka, an idol of the African negroes, supposed to be the guardian of the dead. His image, made of wood, is erected at a small distance from their burial-places.

Chicomatte, in Mexican mythology, was a deity whose festival was celebrated in the second month, Tlakaxipehualiztli.

Chidakochi-Altan (the golden one, the wealthy), in Mongolian mythology, is the name of Buddha among those tribes who accept his teaching.

Chidester, David, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born about 1806. He was converted in his youth, and in 1838 entered the Black River Conference; but after laboring seventeen years, failing health obliged him to become a supernumerary. Seven years later he again entered the effective ranks, but was only able to endure four years, and retired once more. When not in the pastoral work he practiced medicine and dentistry. He died a superannuated member of the Central New York Conference, at his residence in Syracuse, Sept. 7, 1875. Mr. Chidester possessed rare talent and culture; was genial and liberal. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 121.

Chidr, in the mythology of the Orient, was, according to Arabian sagas, the commander-in-chief of an ancient Persian sovereign, Kheikhobad, and a prophet who, having drank from the spring of life, now lives until the judgment-day. Alexander the Great sought this spring of eternal youth, which was said to be in Caucasus, but without success. Chidr is mentioned in a poem by Ruckert, which bears that name.

Chieslie, John (1), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1602, was appointed to the living at Quothquan in 1617, and died April 6, 1635, aged about fifty-three years. His son John became a great incendiary during the troubles, and his son Walter was notorious as the assassin of lord president Lockhart in 1689. See Fusti Eccles. Scotice, i, 227.

Chieslie, John (2), A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1708, and studied theology at Glasgow University, where he held a bursary; became governor (tutor) to Richard Carwell; was licensed to preach in 1716; called to the living at Fenwick in 1718; ordained in 1719; and died March 22, 1740. See Fusti Eccles. Scotice, ii, 163.

Chieslie, John (3), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1754; presented to the living at Abercrombie in 1756; ordained in 1757; and transferred to Corstorphine in 1758. He introduced the Paraphrases into public worship, which offended some of the people, and they formed a secession congregation at Sighthill. He died June 12, 1788. See Fasts Eccles. Scotticane, i, 187; ii, 408.

Chiffelet (or Chifflet) is the name of several learned Frenchmen, of whom we mention the following:

1. JEAN, son of Jean Jacques, born about 1612, was canon of Tournay, and a Hebrew scholar. He died Nov. 27, 1666, leaving, among other works, Apologetica Purvanensis ad Linguam Sanctam:—Judicium de Fubula Joanne Papize.

2. JEAN JACQUES, a physician, was born Jan. 21, 1588, at Besançon, and died in 1660. He wrote, among other works, De Linteis Sepulchralibus Christi Servatoris (Anvers, 1624):—De Ampula Renensi (ibid. 1650); in which he proves that the legend is a pious fraud.

3. LAURENT, brother of Jean Jacques, was born in 1598; joined in 1617 the order of the Jesuits; became a zealous missionary; and died at Antwerp, July 9, 1658. He wrote, Psalterium B. Mariæ:—Doctrina Christiana:—Exercitia Inferiorum:—Praefixio Deotionis, etc.

4. PHILIPPE, another brother of Jean Jacques, was born at Besançon, May 10, 1597. He was canon of Besançon, abbot of Balerne, archbishop of Besançon, etc., and died in 1657. He is known by his Canones et Decreta Concilii Tridentini, cum Præfatione et Notis (Anvers, 1640).

5. PIERRE FRANÇOIS, also brother of Jean Jacques, was born in 1592. In 1609 he joined the Jesuits, and died at Paris, May 11, 1682. He edited the works of Fulgentius and of other Church writers.

Chija (or Chaja), BAR-ABBA, a Jewish writer of the 2d century, and a contemporary of Judah the Holy, was descended from a noble Babylonian family. He settled in Palestine, to co-operate with Rabbi Judah in his great work, the redaction of the Mishna, at Tiberias. Judah held him in the highest esteem, speaking of him as "the man of his counsel" (Baba Mezia, fol. 5, col. 1). Of Chija it was said that, "if the law were lost, he would be able to restore it from memory." He was a Biblical as well as a traditional teacher, and labored not only to indoctrinate his students with the dogma of the oral law, but to lead them to the fountains of pure inspiration. His indefatigable and all-embracing activity was such as to give occasion to the hyperbolic saying that "Chija, with his own hand, took the deer in the chase and skinned them for parchments, which he would inscribe with the records of the law, and distribute, without money or price, for the instruction of the young." He taught, concerning the book of Job, that its author was no Jew, and that Solomon wrote his books when he was old. See Hamburger, Real-Encyclop. ii, 737 sq.; Friedländer, Geschichtsbilder aus der Zeit der Tannaiten, p. 102 sq. (B. P.)

Chilam-Cambol, in the mythology of the West-Indians, was said to be the name of a great prophet in Yucatan, who commanded the inhabitants to recognise and obey the doctrine of the bearded men that would come across the sea and bring the cross.

Chilcott, CYRUS A., a Baptist missionary, was born at East Hamburg, N. Y., Oct. 4, 1836. He graduated at the University of Rochester in 1861, and at the Rochester Theological Seminary in 1864; was ordained at Fredonia, July 20, that year, and soon after sailed, under appointment of the American Baptist Missionary Union, to Bangkok, Siam, where he died, Dec. 30, 1865. See Gen. Cat. of Rochester Theol. Sem. p. 26. (J. C. S.)

Child, Eber, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Vermont in 1798. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1821, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1826, having been from 1821 to 1823 principal of Lawrence Academy, Groton, Mass. He was ordained Feb. 19, 1829; was pastor at Deering, N. H., from 1830 to 1834; at Calais, Me., from 1834 to 1837; at Byron, N. Y., from 1839 to 1843; stated supply at Varysburg, in 1845; at Newstead, in 1846; and at Fulton, Wis., until his death, Dec. 15, 1847. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 69.

Child, James L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, spent his early life as a sailor. Soon after his conversion he connected himself with the Free-will Baptists, was ordained as a minister among them, and for some time labored in that position with acceptability and success. In 1858 he joined the Methodists, and in 1859 was admitted into the Michigan Conference. After serving seven different charges his health failed, and obliged him to become a superannuate. He died in Denver, Col., Sept. 10, 1873. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 107.

Child, S. R., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Vermont in 1823. He entered Jubilee College in 1844, was ordained deacon in 1849, and admitted to the priesthood in 1851. For six years he preached at Warsaw, Ill., and then removed to Decatur, where he died, Nov. 14, 1855. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1855, p. 638.

Child, Willard, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Woodstock, Conn., Nov. 14, 1796. He received his preparatory education at Woodstock and Monson academies, and graduated from Yale College in 1817, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1820; from 1822 to 1825 was teacher at Blue Hill Academy, Maine; then became acting pastor at Benson, Vt., where he remained until November, 1826. He was ordained at Pittsford, April 25, 1827, and remained there until Sept. 8, 1841; then was acting pastor at North Woodstock, Conn., and Aug. 31, 1842, was installed at Broadway Church, Norwich, where he remained until August, 1845. Next, he was installed over First Church, Lowell, Mass., Oct. 1, 1845, and was dismissed Jan. 3, 1855; Feb. 14 following was installed over the Church at Castleton, Vt., dismissed March 2, 1864; and for seven months, during the pastor's absence, supplied Old South Church, Worcester, Mass. In 1866 he became acting pastor at Crown Point, N. Y., and remained such until 1873; from which date he remained without charge, but preached most of the time in Pittsford, Vt., Mooers, Plattsburg, and Champlain, N. Y. From 1840 he was corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. In 1837 and 1857 Dr. Child was moderator of the General Convention of Vermont, and preacher in 1829. He died at Mooers, Nov. 13, 1877. (W. P. S.)

Child, William Chauncy, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Johnstown, N. Y., in August, 1817. He graduated from Union College in 1840, and from Newton Theological Institution in 1844. He was ordained at Charlestown, Mass., Oct. 30, of that year, and after six years removed to Framingham, where he was pastor until 1859. In 1861 he was chosen district secretary of the American Tract Society, Boston, and held the office eight years. He was next made district secretary of the American Baptist Publication Society, and continued in that office until 1873. During the latter years of his life Dr. Child occupied a responsible position on the editorial staff of the Watchman and Reflector. He died at Boston, Jan. 14, 1876. See Newton General Catalogue, p. 28. (J. C. S.)

of Clovis, among whom their father's kingdom was divided in 511. His capital was Paris, and his share embraced the territory between the Seine, Loire, and the sea, including part of Armorica. In the many wars that followed, pope Vigilius appears to have instructed his vicar in Gaul, the archbishop of Arles, to endeavor to maintain friendly relations between Childebert and Justinian, and in 550 the pope induced Childebert to write to the Goths in Rome to abstain from doing anything to the prejudice of the Church. Childebert died at Paris in 558, and Clotaire became king of the united Frankish realm.

Childeric I, king of the Salian Franks, and father of Clovis, reigned from 458 to 481. Though a heathen, he had friendly relations with the Catholic Church. He had the greatest reverence for St. Genevieve, and reprieved some prisoners at her instance. Rütckert has a chapter on the relations of the Frankish kings to Christianity before the conversion of Clovis. Childeric's capital was Tournay, and there, in 1653, his tomb was discovered and opened.

Childers, Richard L., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Macon, Ga., Oct. 12, 1827. He was converted in 1841; spent the following five or six years acquiring a practical business education; graduated at Emory and Henry College, Virginia, in 1850; removed to Pleasant Hill, De Soto Parish, La., where he was some time engaged as teacher in the Masonic Academy, and in 1851 entered the Louisiana Conference. He died at his post, in the midst of useful and arduous labors, of yellow fever, Aug. 3, 1853. As a preacher, Mr. Childers was characterized by severe plainness, excellent method, and searching application. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1853, p. 482.

Childers, Robert Caesar, an English Orientalist, was born in 1838, and died in London, July 25, 1876. For some time he resided at Ceylon, as private secretary to the English governor, where he paid special attention to the native dialects. He is well known by his Grammar of the Pali Language, and still more so by his dictionary of that tongue, which he was the first to make directly accessible to students. Mr. Childers also contributed to the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain, and other literary journals. (B. P.)

Childrey, JOSHUA, D.D., an English divine and natural philosopher, was born in 1623. He was educated at Rochester, and soon after became one of the clerks of the house at Magdalen College, Oxford. He left the university on the breaking out of the rebellion, but returned when Oxford was surrendered to the parliament, by which body he was expelled two years later. He then taught school at Feversham, in Kent, for a time, when he was made chaplain to Henry, lord Herbert, and obtained the rectory of Upham, in Dorsetshire. In 1663 he was collated to the archdeaconry of Salisbury, and in June, 1664, to the prebend of Yatminster, in the same church, by bishop Earle. He died at Upway, Aug. 26, 1670. Some of his publications are, Indago Astrologica (1652, 4to);—Syzygias-ticon Instauratum (Lond. 1653, 8vo);—Britannia Baronica (ibid. 1661, 8vo).

Childs, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Calvert County, Md. He was converted in early life, spent some time successfully in the local ministry, and entered the Baltimore Conference about 1789. He shortly afterwards located, and returned to his agricultural employment. In 1816 he was readmitted into the Conference, and continued in its active ranks until 1829, when ill-health obliged him to become a supernumerary. He died in the course of that year. Mr. Childs was highly esteemed as a man and a minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 76.

Childs, Thomas, a Universalist minister, was born about 1794. After spending some time as a Primitive Baptist preacher, he embraced Universalism about 1852, and from that time preached it to the close of his life, as opportunity afforded. He died at Fayetteville, Tenn., Aug. 14, 1872. See Universalist Register, 1873, p. 123.

Childs, Thomas S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Beaufort, Brecknockshire, South Wales, Oct. 15, 1827. He was converted when nineteen years of age; licensed to preach two years later; emigrated to St. Clair, Schuylkill Co., Pa., in 1849, and in 1853 entered the Philadelphia Conference. He became supernumerary in 1861, and died May 23, 1869. Mr. Childs was an earnest, faithful preacher, and a devout Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 48.

Childs, Wentworth L., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in New Hampshire, nurtured in the Episcopalian communion, and ordained deacon in 1849, and priest in 1851. For a time he was assistant minister of St. John's, Portsmouth, Va., and in 1853 removed, as rector, to St. Alban's, near Washington, D. C., where he died, Dec. 14, 1860. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1861, p. 186.

Chilian, a Benedictine monk of the 8th century, belonged to the monastery of Tuis-Keltre, in Ireland. He left a Life of Saint Brigitta, in Latin verse, which is found in the collection of Bollandus, Feb. i, 100.

Chilleau, JEAN BAPTISTE DU, a French prelate and theologian, was born Oct. 7, 1737, in the castle of Carrière, in Poitou, and took orders very early. He became chancellor to Marie Leczinska, and some time later to Marie Antoinette, and in 1781 was appointed bishop of Châlons-sur-Saône. At the time of the revolution he opposed, very strongly, the religious reforms instituted by the constitutional assembly, and left France. He protested, in 1803, with fifty-eight other bishops, against the concordat of 1801. On returning to France, in 1814, he gave in his resignation as bishop; but was appointed, in 1819, archbishop of Tours, and peer of France in 1822. He died Nov. 26, 1824, leaving several Lettres Pastorales, which were reprinted in the Collection Ecclésiastique, by the abbé Guillon, under the name of abbé Barruel. See Hoefler, Nour. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chilon (1), a solitary, instructed in the duties of a monastic life by a letter attributed in one copy to Nilus, but generally included in the works of Basil the Great (Epist. 42); (2) a Church servant, who is severely rebuked by Nilus (Epist. ii, 158, p. 195) for his inability to keep a secret.

Chilperic II, king of France, was a son of Childeric II. On the assassination of his father, in 673, he was confined in a monastery, and afterwards ordained priest under the name of Daniel. In 715 the Nuestrian Franks raised him to the throne, and his title was nominally recognised in 719 by Charles Martel, who claimed jurisdiction of the whole kingdom. He died in the following year, and was buried at Noyon.

Chilton, Ezekiah T., a Baptist minister, was born in Eastern Virginia, Oct. 15, 1810. He became a Christian at the age of sixteen, was ordained Nov. 11, 1837, and preached in different places in Virginia till 1851 or 1852, his labors being accompanied with marked success. Moving to Illinois, he engaged in evangelistic work in Morgan, Scott, Green, and other counties. In the winter it was his custom to hold protracted meetings for several months. He died Dec. 16, 1875. Mr. Chilton is said to have been a man of far more than ordinary ability. See Minutes of Ill. Anniversaries, 1876, p. 8. (J. C. S.)

Chilton, Thomas, a Baptist minister, was born in Virginia, probably about 1769, and went with his parents when a child to Kentucky. In 1789 he united with a "Separate" Baptist Church, and not long after began to preach. In order to bring the different schools of Baptists in Kentucky into harmony, he published, in 1801, his Terms of General Union. The desired end was accomplished, but the union lasted only a short time. A portion drew off in 1803, under the leadership of John Bailey (q. v.), to which Mr. Chilton adhered. He published a small volume in 1835, in vindication of the position which he and his associates had taken. His death took place in 1840. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 216. (J. C. S.)

Chimæra, in Greek mythology, was a monster produced by Typhon and Echidna. It is generally represented as a lioness, with a second head, that of a goat, projecting from the back, and the tail that of a dragon. Bellerophon was commanded byking

Jobates, in Lycia, to battle with the monster, which was only possible with the assistance of Minerva. The goddess gave to the courageous youth the winged horse Pegasus, by the aid of which the Chimæra was overcome.

Chimalli, in Mexican religious usages, were the consecrated shields carried by men of high rank. They were round, covered with feathers, and adorned with gold and other decorations. It was possible to bend them and carry them under the arm.

Chim-Hoam is a Chinese idol, supposed to be the guardian of cities. All officials in the Chinese government were formerly obliged, under penalty of forfeiting their situation, to repair to the temple of Chim-Hoam when entering their official career, and thereafter twice a month, and there prostrate themselves before his altar, adore and worship the idol, with offerings of candles, perfumes, flowers, flesh, and wine, and there receive their oath of office.

Chimney (Fr. cheminée). This term was not originally restricted to the shaft of the chimney, but included the fireplace. There does not appear to be any evidence of the use of chimney-shafts in England prior to the 12th century. In the part of Rochester Castle which is of the date probably of 1180, there are complete fireplaces with semicircular backs, and a shaft in each jamb supporting a semicircular arch over the opening, which is enriched with the zigzag moulding; some of these project slightly from the wall; the flues, however, go only a few feet up in the thickness of the wall, and are then turned out at the back, the apertures being small oblong holes. A few years later, the improvement of carrying the flue up through the whole height of the wall appears. The early chimney-shafts were of considerable height, and circular; afterwards they assumed a great variety of forms, and during the 14th century they were frequently very short. Previous to the 16th century the shaft is often short and not unfrequently terminated by a spire or pinnacle, usually of rather low proportions, having apertures of various forms under, and sometimes in it, for the escape of the smoke. There are also taller shafts of various forms, square, octangular, or circular, surmounted with a cornice, forming a sort of capital, the smoke issuing from the top. In the 15th century the most common form of chimney-shafts was octangular, though they were sometimes square; the smoke issues from the top, unless, as is sometimes the case, they terminate in a spire. Clustered chimney-shafts did not appear until rather late in the 15th century; afterwards they became very common, and were frequently highly ornamented, especially when of brick.

Chin, JOHN, an English Baptist minister, was born at Hinton, near Blandford, Dorsetshire, in May, 1778. He was baptized in London, and united with the Church in Church Street, Blackfriars Road. He was ordained Dec. 29, 1807, as pastor of the newly formed Church in Lion Street, Walworth, where he remained about twenty-six years, until disabled by ill-health. He died Aug. 28, 1839. See Report of the Baptist Union, 1840, p. 27. (J. C. S.)

China is an idol of the people of Casamanze, on the coast of North Guinea, Africa. In honor of this deity they assemble yearly, about the close of November, at midnight, previous to sowing their rice, take up the idol with great reverence, and go in procession to the appointed station where sacrifice is to be offered. A quantity of rice being burned, each devotee makes his offering, smokes his pipe, and then all unite in begging the god to bless their harvest. He is then carried back to his place of residence, in the profoundest silence. This deity is represented by the head of a bullock or ram, carved in wood, or else made of paste of the flour of millet, kneaded with blood, and blended with hair and feathers.

Chinchon, BERNARDO PEREZ DE, a Spanish theologian, was born at Gandia, in the kingdom of Valencia, and lived in the 16th century. He was canon of the Collegiate Church of Valencia, and wrote, Historia de la Sucesión, etc. (Valencia, 1536):—Espejo de la Vida Humana (Granada, 1587, 8vo):—Anti-Alcoran (Salamanca, 1595). Chinese Religion. It is hardly possible to speak of one religion in so extended a country as China. There are four principal religious beliefs which are distinguishable, although related to each other. The purest is that of Kon-fu-tse or Confucius (q. v.). This faith is professed by the learned, and is better designated as a philosophic system of morals than as a religion. The second is that of Lao-tse or Lao-kyun (q. v.), whose priests exert a powerful influence over the people by their prophecies and soothsayings; hence it is the popular religion. The third is called the religion of Fo, although it might, perhaps, more justly be called the religion of Buddha (q. v.), as it is a Buddhist religion modified to suit the Chinese. Both these latter forms are younger than the religion of Confucius. The real religion of the court is that of Lama (q. v.), which is also generally accepted by the Manchoorians or Tartars. All these sects have numerous priests, who mostly live in monasteries, and acknowledge high and low officials, forming a hierarchy wholly separate from the state government. They lead an idle life, and are highly honored in places where labor is a disgrace. They, however, have no functions to perform in relation to life. They are neither employed at the birth or naming of a child, nor at marriages or deaths. See CHINA.

Chinese Versions of the Scriptures, or, rather, Versions in the Languages of China.—The preparation of an accurate version of the Bible in the Chinese language has engaged the attention of many missionaries since a very early period. The translations of the Nestorians in this direction, during their residence in China for nearly eight hundred years, have not reached us; but it is unwise to infer therefrom that they did nothing in this respect, for else how could they have taught the messages of their God and Saviour to a literary, intelligent people? The Roman Catholics, who went to China about three hundred years ago, have had many learned and earnest men in their missions, some of whom have turned their attention to a translation of the Bible into those languages. The portions which are found in their missals, used in the public service, were translated soon after gathering congregations, and as early as 1636 one of them published a careful version of all the portions read on Sundays and feast-days, with comments on each lesson. Others of them prepared similar treatises for their converts, but, though often proposed, none of the hundreds of missionaries who have lived in China have ever put into the hands of their disciples a complete version of the Bible. All the versions belong to this century, and at present there exist five leading versions in Chinese, i. e. in the literary or book language (Wên-Le), as distinguished from the colloquial.

I. Classical Versions.—1. Dr. Marshman's Version of the whole Bible, printed at Serampore in 1822. It was commenced at Bengal in 1806, and completed by Dr. Marshman and his son. During the first decade of the century, while this version was in preparation, several portions of the New Test., translated by Mr. Johannes Lassar, professor of Chinese in Fort William College, Calcutta (Dr. Marshman's instructor), were issued as tentative essays. The Rev. Josiah Goddard, who went to the East in 1839, was especially commissioned by the American Baptist Board of Foreign Missions to carry through a revision of Marshman's version, and brought out a new translation of the New Test. in 1853, with the title Shing king sin é cháu tseuen shoo. At his death, in the following year, it was found that he had made but little progress with the Old Test., and his labors were continued by the Rev. Dr. Dean of the same mission, residing at Bangkok; but whether he has issued anything beyond the Pentateuch we are not aware. A copy of Marshman's Bible is now a rarity. A version of the New Test. was also published by the Rev. T. H. Hudson, in instalments, completed about 1867.

2. The whole Bible, as translated by Morrison and Milne, was first printed in 1823, with the title Shin t'ên shing shoo, in 21 vols., on wood blocks, at Malacca. When Dr. Morrison presented, in 1824, the sacred volume at the anniversary meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, Mr. Butterworth related the following incident: "It is now many years ago, that in visiting the library of the British Museum, I frequently saw a young man who appeared to be deeply occupied in his studies; the book he was reading was in a language and character totally unknown to me. I asked the young man what it was; he replied, diffidently, 'The Chinese,' and said, 'I am trying to understand it, but it is attended with singular difficulty; if the language is capable of being surmounted by human zeal and perseverance, I mean to make the experiment.' Little did I think," continued Mr. Butterworth, "that I then beheld the germ, as it were, of that great undertaking, the translation of the sacred Scriptures into the Chinese language."

The New Test. of this version was made by Dr. Morrison on the basis of an old version of the Gospels, Acts, and Epistles, which he obtained in England, copied from a MS. in the British Museum, and brought out with him to China. The book of Acts was revised from the old MS., and first printed in 1810; Luke was printed in 1811; most of the Epistles in 1812; the Pauline Epistles being merely revised by Dr. Morrison. The New Test. was completed in 1813. In the Old Test. Dr. Morrison translated Genesis to Numbers, Ruth, Psalms to Malachi. The remaining books were translated by Dr. Milne. A new and slightly revised edition of this Bible was published in large type on wooden blocks in 1832, at Malacca. A revision of Morrison's Luke and Acts, by Dr. Milne, was published in London in 1845, on English paper.

3. Medhurst's Version.—The New Test., as translated by Dr. Medhurst, was printed in Batavia by lithography in 1837, with the title Sin é cháu shoo. This version was nominally the work of a committee, consisting of Drs. Medhurst, Gutzlaff, Bridgman, and Morrison, in 1835, but it was understood to be chiefly the work of the first named, and underwent a final revision by him when he returned to England in 1836. Modified editions of this were published at Singapore and Serampore. Dr. Medhurst had also a hand in the Old Test., eventually published by Dr. Gutzlaff. Dr. Medhurst's effort for an improved translation at length resulted in the convention of a committee of delegates from the several stations in China. This met at Shanghai, and the result of its labors was the Delegates' Version of the New Test., first published complete in 1852, under the title Sin yò tseuen shoo. The delegates who attended the committee were the Rev. Drs. Medhurst, Bridgman, Stronach, and Milne. (It is true the Rev. W. Lowrie of the American Presbyterian Mission was on that committee, but they had not finished the first chapter of Matthew when he left for a visit to Ningpo, and was killed by pirates on the way. Dr. Milne, of the London Society, was elected in his stead. Bishop Boone was also on the committee, but he never attended for translation one day after the first chapter of Matthew. Dr. Bridgman, on the part of the American Board of Commissioners, was also on the committee, and attended very regularly, but it has repeatedly been stated by the translators that he never made a suggestion which was adopted, and soon after the completion of the New Test. he repudiated the version altogether. Thus this translation was virtually the work of the English missionaries, Rev. Drs. Medhurst, Stronach, and Milne, all of the London Missionary Society.) When the New Test. was completed, Drs. Medhurst, Stronach, and Milne translated the Old Test. on the same principle, and it was first published at Shanghai in 1855, under the title Áw tseuen shoo. Many subsequent editions of the Old and New Tests. are often spoken of under the name of the Delegates' Version, though in fact it was not the New Test. that was done by them in the capacity of delegates, and given out in MS. by the translators with the terms for "God" and "Spirit" left blank, not the express understanding that all and every one of the Protestant missionaries then or afterwards engaged in the work of evangelizing China might insert the rendering of these two words which they approved, but no other liberty with the text was to be allowed, except in the single case of the word baptize. From the report of the British and Foreign Bible Society for the year 1870, we see that a New Test. of the Delegates' Version was printed with marginal references for the first time, under the care of the Rev. A. W. Chubb of Foochow, and in the report for 1873 it is stated that the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society was instructed to form a committee which shall fairly represent the Chinese missions, and whose object shall be to conserve the text of the Delegates' Version, to receive suggestions from all quarters, and, when needful, to introduce such changes as shall be deemed desirable.

4. Gutzlaff's Version.—The Old Test., translated by Dr. Gutzlaff, was published somewhere about 1840, under the title Kêu é cháu shing shoo. This was commenced, and carried on as far as Joshua, by Messrs. Gutzlaff, Medhurst, Bridgman, and Morrison, in concert, but the remainder seems to have been mainly the work of Gutzlaff. A new edition was cut on blocks by the Chinese Evangelization Society in 1855. The New Test. published by Dr. Gutzlaff, under the title Kookho shó choé yáy soo sin é cháu shoo, is a modification of that published by Medhurst. It was several times revised, and ten or more editions were published under the sanction of the Chinese Union, a native Christian society. Gutzlaff's version of the Old and New Test. is notable as having been republished by the Taé-ping rebels, at first nearly verbatim, but afterwards with some serious alterations.

5. Bridgman and Cuthbertson's Version.—This was commenced soon after the completion of the Delegates' New Test. The New Test. was issued from the press in 1859, with the title Yay soo ke túh káu she choo sin yó tséien shoo. The Old Test. appeared from 1861 to 1863, under the title Káu yó tséien shoo. According to the report of the American Bible Society for 1879, this version is undergoing revision. Besides these five versions of the whole Bible, the New Test. was translated by the late bishop of the Russian Church in Peking, and published in 1864, with the title Sin é cháu shing shoo.

II. Colloquial Versions.—Chinese, if written in the style of literary composition, differs so much from the spoken language, that when read aloud it cannot be understood by mere hearers. Though a perfect picture to the eye, it conveys no definite sound to the understanding. A Chinese boy requires from three to four years to become acquainted with the characters, and when he has mastered these, it occupies an equal time to learn their meaning; whereas the colloquial, being the mother tongue of the country, any intelligent person can learn to read it in a few months. For this reason from time to time colloquial versions were prepared in the different dialects of the country. Of such versions we name:

1. Mandarin Dialect.—This dialect is the most important, as being the colloquial medium of a large proportion of the people of Northern China. The New Test. was translated by the Rev. Dr. Medhurst, in concert with Rev. J. Stronach, in the Southern or Nankin branch of the Mandarin dialect, and published in 1856, with the title Shin yó tséien shoo. Another translation of the New Test. was made by a committee in Peking, consisting of the Rev. Drs. Martin, Blodget, Schereschewsky, Burton, and Edkins, who were several years engaged in the work. This is known as the Pekin or Northern Mandarin, and was published about the year 1870, with the title Sin yó tséien shoo. A revised version of this Testament has been completed since 1871. The Old Test. was translated for the American Bible Society by the Rev. Dr. Schereschewsky, and published in 1875, with the title Káu yó tséien shoo. An edition of this translation was also printed at Shanghai by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1877.

2. Shanghai Dialect.—The New Test. has been translated into the Shanghai dialect by the Rev. J. M. W. Farnham, and published about 1870, with the title Sing yák zen su. The same has been transliterated into the Roman character, with the title Sing iak zen su, published contemporaneously with the other. A committee is now engaged on a new translation, on behalf of the American Bible Society.

3. Ningpo Dialect.—Translations of the various parts of the New Test. had been made at different times by the Revs. W. A. Russell, W. A. P. Martin, and other missionaries. These were revised by the Revs. W. A. Russell and H. V. V. Rankin, and published, with the title Sing jah jin shoo. This work was in the Roman character. A revised version, by the Revs. F. F. Gough and J. H. Taylor, was published in London in 1868 by the British and Foreign Bible Society, with the title Ah lah kyiu soo yiwe-su kyit-toh-go sing-iah shu. The New Test. was translated or revised in the Ningpo dialect by the Rev. E. C. Lord of the American Baptist Mission, and published in the Roman character in 1874, with the title Ah lah kyiu-soo yiae-su kyit-toh-go sing-iah shu. Genesis, with the title Tsong shoo kyit, and Exodus, with the title Cih yiae-gyth kyit, were translated in the Roman character by the Rev. H. V. V. Rankin, and published in 1871. Isaiah was translated by the Rev. E. C. Lord, in the Roman character, and published in 1870, with the title Yi-soé wó. Steps have been taken by the American Bible Society to secure a version of the entire Old Test.

4. Foo-chow Dialect.—The New Test. was translated by the Rev. W. Welton of the Church Missionary Society, and published in 1856, with the title Shing king sin yó fuh chow ping hwa. Another translation of the New Test. was made by the Rev. L. B. Peet, and published in 1856, with the title Sin yó tséien shoo. A further translation of the New Test. into this dialect was made by the Rev. Drs. Maclay, Gibson, Baldwin, and Hartwell, which was published in 1866, with the title Sin yó tséien shoo. The book of Genesis was translated by the Rev. C. C. Baldwin, and published in 1875, with the title Chuang she kee. The book of Joshua was translated by the Rev. J. R. Wolfe, and published in 1874, with the title Yo shoo ya ke. The book of Ruth, with the title Loo th ke, and 1 Samuel, with the title Sa moo urh tséien shoo, were translated by the Rev. S. Woodin, and published in 1875. The book of Job was translated by the Rev. J. Maclay, and published in 1866, with the title Yó pih ké lèd. The Psalms were translated by the Revs. L. B. Peet and S. Woodin, and published in 1868, with the title She peén tséien shoo. The Proverbs were translated by the Rev. S. L. Baldwin, and published in 1868, with the title Keén yén tséien shoo. Other books were added since.

5. Amoy Dialect.—The New Test. was translated by the Revs. J. Macgregor, W. S. Swanson, H. Cowie, J. L. Maxwell, M.D., etc., and printed in Glasgow in 1873, with the title Lán é kiu-tái iá-so ki-tok é sin iók. It is in the Roman character. The Psalms were translated in the Roman character by the Rev. J. Stronach, and published in 1873, with the title She peén. Besides the Psalms, the books of Genesis to Joshua have also been published.

6. Swatow Dialect.—The book of Ruth was translated by the Rev. S. B. Partridge, and published in 1875, with the title Loo th she ke.

7. Canton Dialect. See PUNTI VERSION.

8. Hakka Dialect.—The gospel of Matthew was translated by the Rev. R. Lechler in the Roman character, and published in 1866, with the English title. The gospel of Mark was translated in the Roman character by the Rev. T. S. Lörcher, and published in 1874, with the English title. The gospel of Luke was translated in the Roman character by members of the Basle Mission, and published in 1861, with the title Das Evangelium des Lucas im Volksdialekte der Hakka Chinesen. The same gospel was translated by the Rev. E. J. Eitel in the Roman character, and published in 1866 with the English title. The Acts of the Apostles, as translated by the Rev. R. Lechler, were printed in 1874. Besides, there are published the gospel of John, as translated by Rev. Charles Piton, the epistle to the Romans, by the Rev. Mr. Bender, and the epistles to the Corinthians, by the Rev. Kong Ayun, a native missionary, educated at Basle.

9. Kinhwa Dialect.—John's gospel was translated in the Roman character, and published in 1866, with the title Jah-ben jooa foh-ing shoo.

10. Hong Kong Dialect.—The book of Psalms has been adapted to this dialect from the Pekin Mandarin Colloquial, under the superintendence of the Rev. Dr. Eitel. The name "Shanghai" is used for "God" in this version.

11. Chao-Chow Dialect.—The gospel of Luke has been printed in Roman characters in the vernacular of Chao-Chow, in the province of Canton, of which Swatow is the port and chief centre of missionary operations. The translation was adapted by the Rev. William Duffus, from the Delegates' Chinese Version, and carefully compared with the Greek text; and the translator, who is a missionary of the Presbyterian Church of England, was able to carry the work through the press while on a visit in England during the year 1877. This version is intended for the use of the native Christians who have not been instructed in the use of their own very difficult written characters, and it is the first portion of the word of God which has been so brought within their reach. See Bible of Every Land, p. 5 sq. (B. P.)

Ching, James, an English Bible Christian minister, was born at Clovelly, Devon, Jan. 15, 1803. He was converted at the age of seventeen, and eight months afterwards was appointed class-leader. In 1823 he was placed on the circuit plan as local preacher, and in 1829 was taken into the itinerant ministry. He continued to labor until 1864, when, through ill-health, he became superannuated. At missionary meetings he was an interesting and effective speaker. While he labored in the Penzance Circuit the second time, above two hundred persons were brought to Christ. In 1853 he was president of the conference. He died Nov. 2, 1873. See Minutes of the Conference, 1874.

Ching, John, an English Methodist preacher, was born Oct. 1, 1803, at Wolfardisworthy, Devon. He was brought up religiously; was converted at nineteen; joined the Bible Christians; in 1823 became a local preacher; in 1832 entered the ministry, and labored with more than ordinary acceptance and success on thirteen stations. After only a few days' illness, he entered into rest at South Petherton, Somerset, March 31, 1879. He had great power in preaching. See Minutes of the Annual Conference.

Chioccarello, Bartolommeo, a Neapolitan priest, was born about the year 1580, and died in 1646. He wrote, Antistitium Neapolitanae Ecclesiae Catalogus (Naples, 1643).—De Scripturibus Civitatis et Regni Neapolis (edited by Meola, ibid. 1780, 1781, 2 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 815; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Chionia, a saint martyred by fire at Thessalonica, under count Sisinnius, in the reign of Diocletian, is commemorated on April 1, with her sister Agape, who shared her martyrdom. They were sisters of Irene, another martyr of the same city, according to Bede, Mart. April 1 and 5.

Chipana, in the religion of the Andes tribes, was a golden medallion, which the Incas in Peru fastened to the arm with a band, and varied according to their rank. The high-priest had the largest, the king next, and smaller ones were carried by the army officers. As these were hollow and polished inside, they were used to light tinder with, and thus the sacrifices were burned at the festivals of the sun. The deities were usually appeased by flowers and fruit-offerings.

Chipchase, John, an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born in 1792 at Cotherston. He was a school-teacher in Stockton for several years, and was recognised as a minister in 1848. He was not often engaged beyond the limits of his own monthly meetings. His manner as a preacher was plain, yet earnest and instructive. He died March 2, 1862. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1863, p. 23.

Chipman, John, a Congregationalist minister, was born at Barnstable, Mass., Feb. 16, 1691, and graduated at Harvard College in 1711. He was ordained Dec. 22, 1715, pastor of the First Church in the precinct of Salem and Beverly (now North Beverly); and in May 1, 1771, Rev. Enos Hitchcock was chosen his associate. He died March 23, 1775. Mr. Chipman was held in high esteem among his clerical brethren, and was a good representative of the orthodox ministers of Massachusetts in his day. See The Chipman Lineage, p. 25-29. (J. C. S.)

Chipman, Tapping Reeve, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Middlebury, Vt., Feb. 2, 1811. In 1839 he graduated at the General Theological Seminary, and afterwards officiated in Brockport, Leroy, East Bloomfield, and Astoria, N. Y., and Christ Church, Detroit, Mich.; was rector of the Church of the Reconciliation, New York city, and finally assistant minister in St. George's parish, of the same city. He died at White Plains, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1865. He was a good classical scholar, and a zealous, conscientious pastor. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. April, 1865, p. 140.

Chipman, Thomas Handley, a Baptist minister, was born in Nova Scotia, Jan. 17, 1756. He united with the Church at Horton in 1779, and was ordained in 1782. His ministry in Annapolis, Yarmouth, and Queen's counties was greatly blessed. In 1809 he took up his residence in Nictaux, where a Church having been formed in 1810, he was called to be its pastor, which position he held till his death, Oct. 11, 1830. See Cathart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 216. (J. C. S.)

Chipperfield, Thomas, an English Congregationalist minister, was born at Essex in 1771. Being converted while yet a youth, he first united with the Church at Lower Street, Islington, and began to study for the ministry at Homerton College in 1792. His only regular pastorate was at Stretton-under-Fosse, Warwickshire, where he labored fourteen years. He then removed to Essex and established a school and preached in the village of Tollesbury; but afterwards removed to Highgate in 1827, where he carried on his school till his death, Sept. 5, 1852. Mr. Chipperfield was an amiable, sincere, but retiring Christian. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1853, p. 208.

Chippewa (or Ojibway) Version of the Scriptures. This dialect is spoken by the Chippewa or Saulteaux Indians, dispersed through a considerable portion of British North America, and also found in the United States. In this dialect an edition of the entire New Test. was published in 1844 at New York, under the auspices of the American Bible Society. A new and revised edition was published in 1856, under the superintendence of the Rev. Sherman Hall. A translation of the Psalms, prepared by the Rev. Dr. O'Meara, was printed in 1854 at Toronto, at the expense of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; while the minor prophets, in the translation of the Rev. R. McDonald, were published by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1874. The entire New Test., in the syllabic character, was published in 1880. (B. P.)

Chippur. See KIPPURIM.

Chiquitilla, Joseph ben-Abraham, a Cabalist, was born at Medinaceli, in Castile, and died at Prayfiel after 1305. He wrote, חַגְגֵי הַגָּדֵל, The Garden of Nuts, an introduction to the doctrines of the Cabala (Hanau, 1615):—שְׁעֵי צִדְקָה, The Gates of Righteousness, on the ten Sephiroth, in 327 paragraphs (Mantua, 1561):—שְׁעֵי אֱלֹהִים, The Gates of Light, a compendium of cabalistic philosophy on the divine names, Sephiroth, etc. (ibid. 1561; Cracow, 1600); translated into Latin by Knorr von Rosenroth, in the first part of his Cabbala Denudata (Sulzbach, 1677, 1678):—סֵפֶר הַפִּינְקִיָּה, The Book on Vowels, also called שֵׁפֶר הַפִּינְקִיָּה, The Gate to the Points, on the import of the vowel-points (published in the collection of seven treatises, called The Cedars of Lebanon [אַרְבֵּי לְבָנוֹן]; Venice, 1601; Cracow, 1648):—סֵדֶר הַחֻשְׁפֶּל, The Mystery of the Shining Metal, being a cabalistic exposition of the first chapter of Ezekiel (also published in the preceding seven treatises, of which it is the fourth):—סֵדֶר הַמְּסֵרֶת, Mysteries, connected with sundry Pentateuchal ordinances (published by I. Ashkenazi in his Temple of the Lord, or הַיֵּכַל הַזֶּה; Venice and Dantzie, 1596–1606). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 174 sq.; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 215 sq.; Jellinek, Beiträge zur Gesch. der Kabbala, ii, 60 sq.; Steinschneider, *Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Bibl. Chirinos, Fernando de Salazar, a Spanish theologian, was born at Cuenca in the latter part of the 16th century. He entered the order of the Jesuits, became director to the duke of Olivarez, and preacher to Philip IV; but refused all clerical dignities. He died in 1640, leaving, Expositio in Proverbia Salomonis (Paris, 1619):—Defensio pro Immaculata Deiparæ Virginis Conceptione (Alcala, 1618; Cologne, 1621, 1622; Paris, 1625):—Pratica de la Frecuente Comunión (Madrid, 1622, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chirinos, Juan de, a Spanish Trinitarian monk, was born at Granada, and lived in the 16th century. He wrote Sumario de las Persecuciones, etc. (Granada, 1593). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chirinos, Pedro, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Osuna in 1556. He passed a great part of his life in the Philippine Islands, and died at Manila in 1634. While on a visit to Rome as procurator of his province, he published a treatise on the works of the Jesuits in those islands, under the title Relacion de Filipinas y lo que en Ellas ha Checho la Compania de I. H. S. (Rome, 1604, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chirnsyde, William, a Scotch clergyman, was first provost of Bothwell, which he exchanged for the priory of Ballynure, in Roman Catholic times (1552); but he conformed to the Protestant faith before 1567, still holding the benefice of Ballynure. He was transferred to Luss in 1572; to Kilmahew before 1585; returned to Luss in 1588, continued there in 1593, removed again, and returned in 1597. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 264, 351, 365, 366.

Chiron, in Greek mythology, was a son of Saturn and Philyra, a daughter of Oceanus. According to Homer, he was the most famous and just of the Centaurs. In order to hide his connection with Philyra from his wife Rhea, Saturn had changed himself into a horse, whence the offspring had, in part, that form. This, however, is only a later myth, for in Homer there is no intimation of the form of a horse. Chiron was married to Chariclo, the daughter of Apollo, and had one son, Carystus, and two daughters, Ocyrrhoë and Eudeis, the latter of whom became the wife of king Æacus. He lived on the mountain Pelion, in Thessalia, and here the generation of the Chironides, skilled in medicine, took their origin. Being instructed by Apollo and Diana, he became master of hunting, of medicine, of music, and of gymnastics and prophecy. He taught the hero-youth Achilles these arts; likewise Jason, Æsculapius, Actæon, Telamon, Peleus, Theseus, Medeus, Cephalus, Milanion, Nestor, Amphiarus, Meleager, Hippolytus, Palamedes, Ulysses, Menestheus, Diomedes, Castor, Pollux, Machaon, Podalirius, Antilochus, and Æneas. He saved Peleus, his grandson, from the hands of the rest of the Centaurs, who sought to murder him, restored to him the sword which Acæstus had hid, and gave him a powerful lance, which, later, Achilles carried. The Argonauts, on their journey, called on him, and he gave them his blessing. In the combat with Hercules he was wounded by an arrow, and the pain caused him to beg Jupiter to liberate him from immortality, which the god did by transferring that attribute to Prometheus.

Chisholm, Alexander C., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Maury County, Tenn., Feb. 8, 1811. He embraced religion in 1827, and in 1836 entered the Tennessee Conference, in which he labored until the formation of the Memphis Conference, when he became one of its members. He died Oct. 2, 1856. Mr. Chisholm was a man of great excellence of character, a royal preacher, and an exemplary Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1856, p. 679.

Chisholm, David, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1741; was licensed to preach in 1750; called to the living of Kilmorich, as assistant to his father, in 1753; ordained in 1754, and died April 13, 1768. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 298.

Chisholm, James (1), a Scotch prelate, having been chaplain to James III, was advanced to the see of Dunblane in 1486; consecrated the year following; resigned in favor of his own half-brother in 1527; and died in 1534. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 178.

Chisholm, James (2), a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Salem, Mass., Sept. 30, 1815. After attendance at the high-school of Salem, and the Latin school in the same place, he graduated from Harvard College in 1836, immediately after which he became a teacher in an academy at Charlestown, Va., for one year. In 1837 he went to Washington city and taught a select classical school for more than a year, connecting himself with the Protestant Episcopal Church in February, 1839. Leaving Washington the following April, he entered the middle class of the Theological Seminary of Virginia; and in October, 1840, was ordained deacon. His first parish was Norbonne, comprising the two congregations of Trinity (Martinsburg) and Mt. Zion (Hedgesville), Va. Of this parish he was rector from 1842 to 1850, and thereafter at Portsmouth, until his death, Sept. 15, 1855. As a preacher, his style was elaborate and attractive, and he excelled as a pastor. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 768; Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1855, p. 483.

Chisholm (or Chesholme), John, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1663; was licensed to preach in 1667; was cited before the privy council in 1681, for dissuading the magistrates of Peebles from taking the test; deprived in 1689 for not praying for the king and queen, and other acts of disloyalty; and died in Edinburgh, Feb. 12, 1701, aged about fifty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 554.

Chisholm, Thomas, a Scotch clergyman, was born Dec. 14, 1680; licensed to preach in 1709, and called to the living at Kilmorich in 1710. His ordination was fixed for a day in 1711, but was postponed on account of a disturbance by a rabble of Roman Catholics. He died Jan. 6, 1768, aged eighty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 298.

Chisholm, William (1), a Scotch prelate, brother of James (1), came into the see of Dunblane by the resignation of the bishopric into the hands of pope Clement VII, and was consecrated at Stirling April 14, 1527. Chisholm was a great adversary to the reformation. He alienated the episcopal patrimony of this church, most of which he gave to his nephew, Sir James Chisholm, of Cromlix. He died in 1564. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 179.

Chisholm, William (2), a Scotch prelate, nephew of the foregoing, was constituted coadjutor to his uncle in the see of Dunblane, June, 1561; succeeded him in 1564; was much occupied in royal embassies; but was deprived for non-compliance with ecclesiastical rules, and withdrew to France, where, it is said, he was made bishop of Vaison, and died in old age, a Carthusian of Grenoble. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 180.

Chishull, Edmund, a learned English divine and antiquary, was born at Eyworth, in Bedfordshire, and educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. in 1698. In 1698 he set out to travel in the East, and in the following year was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Smyrna, where he continued until February, 1702. He became vicar of Walthamstow, in Essex, and in 1711 was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the queen. He was presented to the rectory of South Church, in Essex, in 1731, and died at Walthamstow, May 18, 1783. He published A Charge of Heresy Maintained against Mr. Dodwell, etc. (1706), also numerous sermons, and a number of works on classical antiquities. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Chitara, Ludwig, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch), or German Reformed, Church, was once an Augustinian monk. He came to America in 1785; studied theology under William Hendel and Caspar Diederus Weyberg, and was licensed about 1787. He served as pastor at Knowlton and Hardwick, N. J., from 1787 to 1792, and died at the latter place. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 210; Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, ii, 404.

Chitna-Rath, in Hindû mythology, is the head or leader of the Gandharvas or Devetas, a numerous host of genii of the lower heavens.

Chittenden, Alanson B., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Durham, N. Y., in 1797. He graduated from Union College in 1824, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1828. He was missionary in Montgomery County in 1827 and 1828; pastor at Glen from 1831 to 1834, and at the same time was missionary to Charlestown, both in the same county; at Amity, Saratoga Co., from 1834 to 1839; Westerlo, Albany Co., in 1839 and 1840; Sharon, Schoharie Co., from 1841 to 1845, and died in 1853. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 210.

Chittenden, Charles, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Clinton, Conn., in 1805. He was converted at the age of twenty-four, was licensed to preach in 1832, and in the following year united with the New York Conference. In 1850 weakness of voice obliged him to become a superannuate. He died April 27, 1872. Mr. Chittenden was a deeply pious and a useful man. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 50.

Chittenden, William, an English Methodist preacher, was born at Chatham, Kent. He was converted in his youth, joined the Bible Christians, became a local preacher at Chatham, entered the ministry in 1832, travelled on six circuits, and died Dec. 18, 1838. He was pious, devout, and useful, a diligent student, and a self-denying Christian.

Chladenius (Chladinie, or Chladny), Georg, a German theologian, was obliged to leave Hungary, his native country, in 1673, on account of the persecutions against the Protestants, and was in 1680 preacher at Hauswalde, in Upper Lausatia, where he died in 1692. He is the author of Inventarium Templorum (Dresden, 1689). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 619; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Chladenius, Johann Martin, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, grandson of the foregoing and son of the following, was born April 17, 1710, at Wittenberg. In 1742 he was professor of Christian antiquities at Leipsic, in 1744 director of the gymnasium at Coburg, and in 1747 professor of theology and university preacher at Erlangen. In 1748 he was made doctor of theology, and died Sept. 10, 1759. He published, Oratio de Voluptate ex Antiquitate Ecclesiastica Capienda (Wittenberg, 1742);—Comment. de Stationibus Veterum Christianorum (ibid. 1744);—Pr. de Sententia Augustini de Stilo Sancta Scriptura in Historia Creationis (Coburg, 1744);—Logica S. seu Introductio in Theologiam Systematicam (ibid. 1745);—Delineatio Theologiae Moralis (Erlangen, 1748). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 606, 629; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Chladenius, Martin, a German theologian, was born at Chemnitz, Oct. 25, 1669. He studied at Wittenberg, was in 1710 professor of theology there, in 1719 provost and member of consistory, and died Sept. 12, 1725. He wrote, Institutiones Ereticæ;—Institutiones Homileticæ;—Institutiones Theologiae Moralis, and a great many other treatises, enumerated in Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. See also Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Chlodulphus, Saint, confessor and bishop, is one of the thirty saints enumerated in the ancient catalogues and martyrologies of the Church of Metz. Chlodulphus took holy orders, but was never a monk or a hermit. He succeeded his father, St. Arnulphus, in the bishopric of Metz, and is said to have been an excellent and renowned prelate, skilled alike in Church and State. He lived in the 7th century, and is commemorated June 8 (Bollandus, Acta Sanctorum, June, ii, 127-132).—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Chlotharius (or Chlotacharius). See CLOTHAIRE.

Chlumczanski, WENZEL LEOPOLD, a Bohemian prelate, was born Nov. 15, 1759. He was successively chaplain at Klösterle, pastor at Gartitz, and afterwards in Prague, where he became chancellor of the metropolitan chapter and suffragan bishop. He was appointed in 1802 to the see of Leitmeritz, and was noted for abnegating and introducing great ameliorations in ecclesiastical discipline. The emperor, wishing to recompense this "father of the poor," gave him the title of private counsellor, and offered him the archbishopric of Lambreg; but the modest prelate refused this latter favor. When he was placed, in 1814, in the archbishopric of Prague, he consecrated nearly all his revenues to the relief of the poor, protected all useful enterprises, and opened two schools—one at Rakonitz, for the arts; the other at Reichenberg, for commerce. He died June 14, 1830. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Choba (or Chobal), of Judith iv, 4, is thought by Lieutenant Conder (Test-Work, ii, 386) to be the present ruin el-Mekhobby ("hiding-places"), on the ancient road from Shechem (see Quarterly Report of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1881, p. 51).

Choctaw Version of the Scriptures. To the Choctaw Indians the American Bible Society gave, in the year 1849, the entire New Test. in the Choctaw version, the translation having been prepared by the Rev. Alfred Wright and his fellow-missionaries. Since that time the American Bible Society has also issued several parts of the Old Test., viz., the Pentateuch, and Joshua to 2 Kings. See Byington, Grammar of the Choctaw Language (edited by D. G. Brinton, from the original MS. in the library of the American Philosophical Society, Philadelphia, 1870). (B. P.)

Chodowiecki, DANIEL NICOLAS, an eminent Prussian designer and engraver, of Polish origin, was born at Dantzig, Oct. 16, 1726. He produced a series of twelve plates of The Passion of Christ, which gained him a great reputation. He was elected director of the Academy of Arts and Sciences in Berlin, and died there, Feb. 7, 1801. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Chodzko, IGNAZ BOREYKO, a Polish preacher and writer, was born at Myśa, in the palatinate of Wilna, in 1720. He joined the Jesuits in 1773, and, after the suppression of that order, became rector of the college of Zodziażki, canon of Smolensk, and collaborator of the celebrated historian Naruszewicz. He died in 1792, leaving The Fables of Phædra, in Polish and French, with the Latin text (Wilna, 1774, 4to). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Choerez, ANTONIO, an ascetic Italian Theatine, of the order of the Franciscans, died June 17, 1684, leaving several memoirs of saints, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Choetshitalba, in the mythology of Thibet, is an evil god, who threatens the destruction of the world; hence another, Jamadaga, was created to battle incessantly with him.

Choice, WILLIAM, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Hancock County, Ga., in January, 1800. He was admitted into the Georgia Conference in 1832, and continued in it, with but a few short interruptions, until 1846, when he was transferred to the Florida Conference. He was zealous and faithful to the close of his life, Aug. 18, 1855. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1856, p. 637.

Choin, LOUIS ALBERT JOLY DE, a French prelate and theologian, was born at Bourg, in Bresse, Jan. 22, 1702. He was grand-vicar of the diocese of Nantes. Having been called to that bishopric, he evinced lively zeal and earnest morality, introducing wise reforms in his diocese, which he strengthened by the simplicity of his manners and the constant practice of charity. He was made several times deputy to the assembly of the clergy, and died April 16, 1759, leaving Instructions sur le Rituel (Lyons, 1778, 3 vols. 4to; new ed. by cardinal Gousset, with notes and dissertations, Besançon, 1828, 6 vols. 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Choiseul (Beaupré), Gabriel Florent de, a French prelate, was born at Dinant in June, 1685. He was consecrated bishop of Saint-Papoul, July 17, 1718, and bishop of Mende in 1723. He died in 1767, leaving Statuts Synodaux (Mende, 1739, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Choiseul, Gilbert de, a French prelate, was born about 1613, and was made doctor of the Sorbonne about 1640. In 1664 he became bishop of Comminges, and administered the see with great enterprise, charity, and purity. He was transferred in 1670 to the see of Tournay, and died at Paris, Dec. 31, 1689. He took a deep interest in the Jansenistic controversy and other reforms, and left a number of sermons, letters, etc., for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Choisseul (Stainville), LÉOPOLD CHARLES DE, a French prelate, was born at the castle of Lunéville, Dec. 6, 1724. He was made bishop of Évreux in 1758, archbishop of Alby in 1759, and of Cambrai in 1764, and died in 1781, leaving Statuts Synodaux du Diocèse d'Alby (1763, 8vo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Choisy, FRANÇOIS TIMOLÉON DE, a French writer, cathedral-dean at Bayeux and dean of the French academy, was born in Paris, Aug. 16, 1644, and died Oct. 2, 1724. He is the author of Histoire de l'Église (Paris, 1706-23, 11 vols.). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 541; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Cholerton, JOHN, an English Baptist minister, was born at Derby in 1827. He was converted in his youth, was baptized, and soon afterwards began to preach. He settled over a church at Leicester, but afterwards removed to Coalville, where his ministry was much blessed, and there he died, Aug. 10, 1865.

Cholet (Colitti, Cioletti, or Carlet), JEAN, a French prelate, was born at Nointel, in Beauvais. After having been canon of the cathedral of Beauvais, he was created cardinal in 1281, and was charged with different missions by popes Martin IV and Nicholas IV, which deeply involved him in the political affairs of his times. He founded the College of the Cholets, upon the mount of St. Geneviève. Cholet died Aug. 2, 1291. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cholmondeley, ROBERT, an English divine, was born Nov. 1, 1727. For some time he was an officer in the army, but entered into holy orders, and was presented by the king to the united rectories of St. Andrew, St. Nicholas, and St. Mary, Hertford, and to the rectory of Hertingfordbury, besides which he held the position of auditor-general of his majesty's revenues in America till the separation of that country from Great Britain. He died June 6, 1804. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1804, p. 488.

Choral Habit. Under this head we give additional particulars respecting the clerical garments:

In England the canons wore a surplice, a black, close, and sleeveless cope, and the gray almuce or hood: regulars used the rochet, and monks their proper habit, but on the Continent the colors are more brilliant. At Pisa, in winter, they wear a large red cope, and in summer a red mozzetta over a rochet; at Salerno, crimson tunics and rochetts, and the hebdomadary wears violet; at Urgel the cope was red, but at Tortosa and Gerona black; at Valencia the cope worn over a rochet is superbly furred, and has a violet hood lined with ermine in winter, and with crimson silk in summer; at Besançon the camail, or hood, is of blue silk, lined with red taffeta; at Strasburg the cope of red velvet is lined with ermine, and has gold guards; at Catania the mozzetta of black cloth is worn over the rochet; at Syracuse the mozzetta is violet, as at Malta, where it is used with a rochet and cope; at Vienne the cope was black, at Rouen it was violet. At Burgos the canons wear in winter a cope, mozzetta, and a surplice with sleeves elevated on the shoulders. By the Council of Tortosa, 1429, the use of furs was restricted to dignities and cathedral canons; but in some special cases in England priest-vicars, who represented dignitaries or priest-canons, as at Exeter, and the subdean of minor canons at St. Paul's, wore a gray almuce, lined with black cloth; at Burgos the vicars' surplices reached to the ground, and were rolled over the hands. At St. Paul's the vicars wore a plain almuce of black cloth, and lined or doubled cap. As early as 1886, the Council of Salzburg required a distinction to be made in the choral dress of canons and vicars. Canons formerly wore violet only in their robes, until the Council of Trent changed the color to black. At Ratisbon the choir-tippet, or mozzetta, is of red silk; in France the camail is black, edged with the same color, in the diocese of Bayeux; in the south, as at Montauban, it is often crimson ermined, and generally rich in hue. At Verona blue cassocks are worn; in Normandy they are scarlet for the choristers; at Milan the scarlet cape and mantle are worn by canons; the vicars carry furred capes on their arm, and the lay singers have hooded black mantles, faced with green.

Chorentæ were a heretical sect who maintained that the Christian Sabbath ought to be kept as a fast. See EUCHITES.

Chorentinus (or Correntinus) was a bishop of Quimper. In Usuard (Patrol. cxxiv, 13) he is called bishop of Aquila, in Lesser Britain. This Aquila must be the Aquilonia of Gall. Christ. xiv, 871, by which name Quimper was sometimes called in the 11th century. His day in Usuard and in Bede is May 1.

Choristers, i. e. boys singing in the choir. These are called in France children of the albs, or simply children of the choir. Those of pope Vitelian (657-672) were lodged and boarded in the parvise, as at Canterbury, Durham, and St. Paul's; they were known as the boys of the almonry. It is recorded of Gregory the Great, St. Germanus, and Nizier, archbishop of Lyons, that they used to attend the choir-boys' music school; and children were required to be church-singers by the councils of Aix-la-Chapelle and Toledo. Pope Urban IV was once a chorister of Troyes. We find them sometimes called clerks of the first or third form, according to the manner in which the rows of seats were numbered. They were usually under the charge of the succentor; but at Salisbury, where they were endowed, they were intrusted to a canon, called the warden of the twelve boys. They carried the cross, censers, and tapers, and were promoted to be thuriblers, to hold minor orders, and, if worthy, advanced to the office of vicars. Their numbers varied between four and sixteen, in different churches; all received the first tonsure, and were maintained at the tables of one of the canons, whom they regarded as their master, and attended. Probably the ordinary arrangement was, that a portion of the number acted as singers, and the rest as assistants at the altar. In the 17th century, at Hereford, they were required to be taught to play on the lyre and harp in choir. In process of time they ceased to subsist on the canons' alms; and at Lincoln they appear first to have been boarded in a house under a master; an excellent precedent which was followed at Lichfield at the close of the 15th century. Their dress was a surplice.

Chorkam is the most exalted of the celestial regions, according to the Hindû system, at which, if a soul of high caste arrives there, it shall undergo no further changes.

Choral, in Slavonic mythology, was an idol which the heathen Muscovites are said to have worshipped as late as the 9th century. It is not known what he represents. He is depicted somewhat like a satyr; half only of his body being human, with hoofs of a horse and a dog's head with a number of horns. In his hand he carries a sceptre; and on the stone square, which supports the image, the sacrificial fire burns.

Choroos (Χοροός) is the Greek form of a name said to be applied in the Zendavesta, as well as in the Shah Nameh, to the great Cyrus (q. v.). The name is certainly not a corruption of Kurush (Cyrus), nor can the latter be a corruption of it; but seems to be somewhat common to Persian kings, as descended from Cyrus. It was not, however, the common royal name of any line, as Araces was with the Parthians, but was borne individually by several monarchs.

Choubret is a festival among the Mohammedans of India in commemoration of the examination of departed souls by angels, the good angels recording the good deeds of this life, and the bad angels the evil deeds. They believe that God examines this record; hence, at the beginning of the feast they are moved with fear of the impending judgment, utter prayers, give alms, and examine themselves; but the occasion ends with illuminations, bonfires, and general rejoicing at the prospect of a favorable record for themselves. See DEAD, EXAMINATION OF.

Chouet, JACQUES, a French Protestant theologian, was born in 1550 in the neighborhood of Auxerre. He left the Catholic Church and went to Geneva. He wrote, Observations Apologétiques, against Scaliger (Geneva):—Doctrine Ancienne, against the same (ibid. 1553, 8vo):—De la Prédestination (Basle, 1599, 1606, 8vo):—De la Conférence Tenue à Nancy (ibid. 1600, 8vo). Chouria Vaukcham (Order of the Sun) is the name of one of the two principal orders of the Hindû rajahs, regarded as the offspring of the sun.

Chowner, JOHN S., a minister of the Society of Friends, was for a long time a member of the Sand Creek Meeting, Ind. He died at his residence in Bartholomew County, Ind., April 1, 1834, aged about fifty years. See The Friend, vii, 328.

Choseba (1 Chron. iv, 22) is thought by Lieut.-ant Conder (Tent-Work, ii, 386) to be possibly the ruin Kueziba, north-east of Hebron (Quar. Report of Pal. Explor. Fund, Jan. 1881, p. 51); but it is not necessary to distinguish the place from Chezib or Achzib.

Chresimus (Chrisimus, Chrisimus, or Chrysimus), a Christian of Augustine's time, was so much cast down by some adverse lawsuit that it was rumored he meditated suicide. Augustine writes to cheer him, and encloses a letter to the court, which he might give or not as he liked (August. Epist. 244 [83], ii, 1059).

Chrestus, in early Christian records, was the name of two prelates:

1. A bishop of Syracuse, was addressed by Constantine the Great A.D. 314, in a letter preserved by Eusebius (H. E. x, 5), wherein the emperor complained of the continuance of discord in Africa, and therefore ordered Chrestus to be present at the Council of Arles by Aug. 1. Chrestus subscribed first of the bishops at Arles (Labbe, Concil. i, 1429).

2. A bishop of Nicæa, elected in the year 325, after the expulsion of Theognius for refusing to sign the Nicene Creed, at the same time that Amphion was appointed in the room of Eusebius of Nicomedia. In the year 328 Chrestus and Amphion had to retire, on the recantation of Theognius and Eusebius.

Chriemhild, in ancient German mythology, was one of the two principal female personages in the myth of the Nibelungen-Lied, being the wife of Siegfried, and his avenger subsequent to his brutal murder by Hagan.

Chriadaphor (i. e. Christopher) was the name of several primates (catholici) of Armenia:

1. Chriadaphor I succeeded Kioud, A.D. 475, and was succeeded by John, A.D. 480.
2. Chriadaphor II succeeded Sahag, A.D. 515, and was succeeded by Gherout, A.D. 521.
3. The Abrahamite, A.D. 625-628. See St. Martin, Mémoires sur l'Arménie, i, 437, 438.

Chrisem (or Holy Oil). We present the following additional particulars on this subject:

"By the Council of Melde, the priest, on Maundy-Thurs-day, had three cruets brought to him, in which were the consecrated oil of the catechumens, chrisem, and oil of the sick. There were two kinds of holy oil: (1) Chrisem, or myron, called principal, a compound of oil and balsam, with which candidates for baptism were anointed upon the head and for confirmation on the forehead; and clerks to be ordained received unction with it. (2) Simple: the pure oil of olives; also consecrated by a bishop for the anointing of the sick and energeumens, and of catechumens on the breast, shoulders, and forehead. Chrisem, at first, was made only of oil, by both Latins and Greeks. In the 6th century, balm brought from Judea was mixed with it; and this kind was in use in the West until the 16th century, when the Spaniards, by permission of Paul III and Pius IV, adopted balm from India. The Greeks use, instead of balm, forty different kinds of aromatic spices. Unction was regarded as the spiritual preparation of Christians to wrestle against the devil, and in memory of the anointing of Christ to his burial. A bishop is anointed on the head and hands. The baptized was anointed previously with oil on the breast and between the shoulders, and after baptism with chrisem on the head and brow. In allusion to 1 John ii, 17; 2 Cor. i, 21; 1 Peter iii, 9, kings at their consecration, altars and churches at dedication, are anointed. The baptismal unction is mentioned by pope Sylvester in 334. Priests anointed the breast, and bishops the forehead of candidates. Chrisem is called myrrh by the ancient writers; it was symbolical of the sweet savor of Christ, also of the anointing of Christians by the Holy Spirit to be a peculiar people—a royal priesthood (Exod. xxx, 25-30; Numb. iii, 8; 1 Sam. xxiv, 6; Luke iv, 18; Acts iv, 27; x, 38; 2 Cor. i, 21; 1 Peter ii, 9). Consecration of chrisem was reserved to bishops only, who distributed it to the parish priests. In the 6th century this ceremonial was fixed to Maundy-Thurs-day, and during the second of the three masses celebrated on that day, which, in consequence, was called the Mass of Chrisem. However, in France, the Council of Meaux, in 845, permitted consecration on any day, as in primitive times; and the Greeks, although regarding Maundy-Thurs-day as the principal occasion, still follow the same practice, but reserve it to the patriarchs, who perform the office with great pomp. The vase for keeping chrisem, from its shape, was called the chrisem-paten. In the 10th century it was brought by the priest before Easter, or by a deacon or subdeacon in the 13th century. All that remained over from the last year was carefully consumed by fire. By the Council of Orange, in 441, chrisem was used once for all in baptism. The chrisem and holy oil were kept under lock and key, to provide against any abuse for purposes of sorcery and witchcraft, in the 13th century. In 1549 children were still anointed with chrisem on the forehead in England. In lieu of this ceremony, the grace of the Holy Ghost is now invoked. Bales say that the chrisem was kept in alabaster boxes."

Chrisma is a name sometimes given in the early Christian Church to the ordinance of baptism, as denoting the unction or anointing of the Holy Spirit.

Chrismarium is a name for the place where confirmation was administered at Rome and Naples; called also consignatorium—the place of sealing. Sacristies were frequently used for this purpose.

Chrismatory is a vase for holding chrisem; otherwise called ampulla (q. v.). That used by William of Wykeham is preserved in New College, Oxford.

Chrisom is a name for a child who dies within a month of his baptism, and is buried in his chrisom-cloth in lieu of a shroud. The engraving here given is that of a memorial brass of the 16th century, at Chesham Church, in Buckinghamshire. It represents Benedict Lee, chrisom child, in his burial cloth. This was ordered to be used in the Church of England up to the year 1552. The custom was that, if a child died within a month of his baptism, this baptismal cloth, or "white vesture," served for a shroud. There is an inscription underneath the figure which reads thus:

Christadelphians (or Brethren in Christ) is a name adopted by a religious body of recent development, which accepts Christ as its authority, but discards the name "Christian." This is said to be on account of the gross perversion of the word Christian. Christadelphians assert that the faith of Christendom is made up of the fables predicted by Paul in 2 Tim. iv, 4, and is entirely subversive of the faith once for all delivered to the saints.

I. Origin.—The organization, made up of independent ecclesiæ, was founded by John Thomas, M.D. (q. v.), who was for a time an associate of Alexander Campbell, but who gradually changed his views from those of "the Disciples of Christ" until he encountered the violent opposition of Mr. Campbell. Although Dr. Thomas secured a hearing in various Campbellite churches of the United States for many years succeeding 1843, lectured and wrote in his native country and England from 1848 to 1850, and afterwards spoke extensively in the United States, continually adding to the number of his adherents, the name Christadelphian was not adopted until 1864. Congress had exempted from war service the members of any religious body which was conscientiously opposed to bearing arms. In order to go upon record in a manner that would secure this exemption, the name was adopted and certified to by Dr. Thomas, in August or September, 1864. In this certificate he stated that the brethren of Ogle County, Ill., to whom it was given, were in fellowship with similar organizations in England, Scotland, the British Provinces, and various cities of the United States, north and south. "New York," he added, "is the radiating centre at this time."

II. General Features, etc.—The Christadelphians have never had any clergy, and consequently little or no ecclesiastical organization. Their customs are very primitive and unostentatious. They assemble every first day of the week, to commemorate the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ by the breaking of bread and partaking of the cup. To this participation, however, none are admitted except those who have been immersed after making declaration of assent to the beliefs of the ecclesia. All communicants are considered as equals religiously, and any member may be designated to conduct the ceremonies at the meetings. After the commemoration of Christ's death a hymn is sung, and if any visitors are present some brother delivers an address. This always relates either to "the things concerning the kingdom," or to "the things concerning the name of Jesus Christ." It is a modest exposition of their creed, abounding in Scripture quotations, and delivered without rhetorical or oratorical adornment. No address is ever made, even to members alone, upon what are known as practical or moral topics. They hold that each one must learn from God's Word, or by private consultation, with reference to right conduct in daily life. They say that if an acceptance of the creed of Christadelphians does not produce right conduct, no amount of lecturing and exhortation will. They teach Christ-like living only by example. The address being over, it is announced that the purpose for which they had assembled being accomplished, the meeting may be considered as having terminated. No collection is permitted for any purpose, but there may be a small box in the room for the reception of any contributions which persons care to make in an unobserved manner. It is not, however, announced that such is the fact. The expenses are exceedingly light, the meetings being held in some "upper room" hired for the purpose, and the payments met by the most quiet means. No church edifice has ever been erected by them, as their principles would not permit it. No direct effort is made to increase the membership. If increase results from voluntary acceptance of their doctrines, it is welcomed. In many cases an ecclesia includes but from four to ten persons. The largest, in Birmingham, England, includes about five hundred. It is not expected that a considerable proportion of any community will join their number, for they realize that they are so unconformed to the luxury, fashions, display, and excitement of the world that but few will accept of truth under such circumstances. They expect that at the second advent, which they believe to be very near, they will all, if found worthy, be made priests and kings, to rule with Christ on the earth. Of course only a small part of the race would be needed for that purpose, even as but a few can be induced to prepare themselves for it. They see this to be in harmony with the prophecies of Christ concerning the few that shall be saved. They also accept cheerfully the necessity of being unknown, devoid of influence, or even despised for the present, in view of future reward. They lose no time upon missionary schemes, temperance, or sectarian schools, or even organized charity. Whatever good is done should be done personally and quietly.

As the number of each ecclesia is small, and the loss of a few of the brethren who are accustomed to be present may at any time interrupt the meetings, and as there is no general oversight by bishop, minister, deacon, committeeman, or other, so there are no statistics of the ecclesia or of members, and no one knows the extent of the sect. They themselves do not care to know its extent, lest some one might boast of it. Offices and organization, as stimulating the ambition of some, are considered in their influence subversive of the true spirit of religious equality and of right thinking and acting. They do not desire any position, religious, political, or otherwise, in this dispensation of the world. They decline to vote or to take any part in secular government, but they submit to the present condition of affairs, considering it too corrupt to be improved until He shall come whose right it is to rule the earth. They have no inducements for people of property to join them, for they think less, if anything, of those who have money. They regard it a duty to devote whatever of this world's goods may be intrusted to them, to doing good and in a secret manner. They desire not to know who is the author of good deeds among them, lest the doer get his reward in the praises of men. They prefer the reward should be deferred till the next dispensation. They do not esteem the first day of the week above any other, and feel entirely at liberty to do whatever they please on that day. They say there has been no divinely ordained Sabbath since Jesus abolished the Jewish Sabbath. But, out of respect for the feelings of others, they do not openly engage in what may be generally regarded as a breaking of the Sabbath, and for convenience they hold their meetings on that day. They will not speak against those who hold different religious creeds, and only ask to be allowed in an unmolested manner to hold and to express their own religious views.

III. Creed.—The doctrines of the Christadelphians are, perhaps, nearer like those of the Adventists than of any other. They hold the Bible to be the inspired Word of God, and demand its literal interpretation. On this basis they defy the disproof of their doctrines. They group their beliefs under two heads, and the outline is as follows:

1. Things Concerning the Kingdom of God.—The gospel preached by Jesus and the apostles was with primary reference to this kingdom. A divine but literal kingdom is to be established on the earth, superseding all existing governments. It has once existed as a type, being the kingdom of Israel, but was destroyed because of iniquity. It will be re-established at Jerusalem, will involve the restoration of the Jews, will extend in dominion over the whole globe, and Jesus of Nazareth will be the supreme ruler. Those who are Christ's will be awarded a participation in the "honor, glory, and power" of that kingdom, in the sense of being associates and coadjutors of Christ in the work of ruling the world in righteousness. The visible reappearance of Christ, and the sharing in his inheritance of the physical kingdom, are therefore the "good news," and the hope of true believers. This kingdom will last a thousand years, in which sin and death will continue as now, but in a milder form. At the end of that period there will be an entire change in the constitution of things. Christ will surrender his position of supremacy, when God will manifest himself as father, strength, governor, and friend of all. Meantime, a revolt of the nations, at the close of the millennium, occurs, and succeeds to the last point, only being suppressed by a summary outburst of divine judgment. Then occurs the resurrection and judgment of all who have died during the thousand years, and a judging of those then alive. The approved are immortalized, and the rejected are destroyed. Sin and death thus abolished, none remain but the righteous, who will inhabit the earth forever. Christ's work being finished, God will no longer deal with men through a mediator. Christ and his associate millennial rulers join the company immortalized at the post-millennial judgment.

2. Things Concerning the Name of Jesus Christ.—There is but one God, who made all things by his spirit. He dwells in a definite locality, "in unapproachable light," and is not universally diffused through space. The Spirit is his instrumental power, and extends whithersoever he wills. God's spirit is manifested, not personally, but by his works. God did not dwell personally in Jesus Christ, but the Messiah was approved of God, and in character was assimilated to the divine character. He was filled with the spirit of God. "Spirit" is a scriptural personification of the power, wisdom, and goodness of Deity. Christ had these from the Father. Jesus Christ is not one of an eternal Trinity, but is the manifestation of the one eternal Creator. He had two sides in the days of his weakness; one Deity, one man. The latter dated from his birth. The Deity dwelling in him was of the eternal Creator. Before "the man Christ Jesus," there was but one eternal God, and he neither Father nor Son. Notwithstanding the mode of his conception and anointing with the Holy Spirit, Jesus was of our nature, a second Adam, tempted in all points like ourselves, triumphant by obedience, thereby removing the consequences of Adam's sin. His death was not to appease the wrath of an offended Deity, but to express the love of Deity, by abrogating the law of sin and death through a full discharge of its claims. Holding immortality in trust for the obedient, he now acts as priestly mediator between the Father and those who come unto God by him.

According to the Christadelphians, the devil is a scriptural personification of sin in the flesh, not the name of a personal, supernatural being. Man is a creature of the dust, whose individuality and faculties are attributes of his bodily organism. In the state of death, man, instead of having gone to another world, is simply a body deprived of life. Corruption will destroy the body and nothing remain of what was a living man. This mortality is the consequence of Adam's sin. In the Bible, soul means creature, but never involves the idea of immortality. Spirit, as applied to man, is no more expressive, but signifies breath, vital energy, etc.—attributes of the living being. The doctrine of the inherent immortality of the soul is a pagan fiction. But there is a doctrine of immortality attainable, to be found in the Bible. Instead of being inherent in man, it is a quality to be acquired through belief in the gospel and obedience to the divine commands. It results from resurrection and the change supernaturally wrought upon the body. It is not a right nor a property of man's fallen nature, but is a gift to be bestowed upon the faithful. It will be enjoyed upon the earth, which is to be the habitation of the saints. Hell and eternal torments are fictions of popular theology. The hell of Scripture is either sheol, the grave; or it is gehenna, a place of judicial execution in the land of Israel. It was once so used, and will be again, on a larger scale. The grossly wicked are to be convicted and annihilated, while that larger part of mankind which is sunk in ignorance and degradation will never see the light of resurrection.

IV. The only publications of the sect are The Christadelphian, a small monthly magazine, issued in Birmingham, Eng., and the following literature: Roberts, Dr. Thomas's Life and Work:—Twelve Lectures on the Teaching of the Bible in Relation to the Faiths of Christendom:—Is the Bible Divine? (six nights' debate between Charles Bradlaugh, of London, and R. Christfels (or Christfeld), PHILIP ERNST (originally Mordecai), a German convert from Judaism, was born at Uhlfeld-on-the-Aich in 1678. July 11, 1701, he openly professed Christianity at Wilhelmshöf, in Hohenlohe. Being a learned Hebrew scholar, he was offered a professorship at Leipsic, which he, however, refused, preferring the office of chamberlain given to him by his sponsors, the count and countess of Hohenlohe. He wrote, Gespräch im Reiche der Todten über die Bibel und Talmud (Schwabach, 1737):—Jüdische Fechtschule (ibid. 1760). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 177; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 4, no. 1830^b; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Kalkar, Israel u. die Kirche, p. 105; Delitzsch, Saat auf Hoffnung, iv, 191 sq. (B. P.)

Christhold, CHRISTIAN ALBRECHT, a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born in Judaism in 1684, at Oettingen. When three years old he was baptized, with his parents. He studied for the ministry at Tübingen, was con-rector and afterwards rector in his native place, in 1716 became pastor and superintendent at Appenzhofen, and died there in 1766, while a member of consistory. He wrote, De es quod Judei in Republica sint Tolerandi (Oettingen, 1711):—De Judæorum Conversione Generali Expectanda (ibid. 1715). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 177; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 1895^c; Schudt, Jüdische Merkwürdigkeiten, iv, 2303; Saat auf Hoffnung, iv, 2, 90; Kalkar, Israel u. die Kirche, p. 108; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Christi is an appellation given by St. Ambrose to believers in Christ, in reference to Psalm cv, 15, "Touch not mine anointed," or my Christi, as it is rendered in the Vulgate.

Christian, a German prelate who died in 1183. Although archbishop of Mayence from 1164, yet he is known only by his great military expeditions in Italy from 1167 to 1181. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Christian is a surname common to many Jewish converts, of whom we mention:

1. CHRISTOPHER GUSTAV, of Nuremberg, who was baptized in 1719, is the author of, יסוד אמונת הנוצרית, i. e. The Elements of the Christian Religion (Berlin, 1712, 1719):—Die Bekehrung Israels (Schwabach, 1722). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 177; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 1898^b; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

2. FRIEDRICH, author of Beschreibung von der Juden ihrer falsch-vermeinten Freude, etc. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 177; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 1851^b.

3. MAGNUS, author of Traktat von der Juden Aberglauben (Hamburg, 1718). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 177; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 1402^b; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

4. PAUL (originally Malachia ben-Mardechai), was born in 1599. He was rabbi at Brzesc, in Lithuania, and was baptized in 1621 at Brunswick. He wrote Jüdischer Herzklopper, or a history of his conversion, and his confession (Brunswick, 1621). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 177; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. i, 965; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Christian, Levi Hunt, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Albany, N. Y., Aug. 1, 1817. He graduated at Princeton College, N. J., in 1840, and studied for two years (1842-45) at the Princeton Theological Seminary. He was ordained by the Winchester Presbytery in 1846, and labored as a missionary within its bounds for some time. In 1848 he became pastor at Rochester, N. Y., and soon after in Washington, D. C.; in 1852 in Camden, N. J.; in 1854 in Hamilton, O., and in 1856 in Philadelphia, Pa., resigning on account of ill-health in 1863. He died in Philadelphia, Oct. 23, 1864. He was constant, devoted, and self-sacrificing. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 99.

Christian, Richard Allen, a Baptist minister, was born in Charles City County, Va., July 27, 1796.

He studied medicine in the University of Pennsylvania. In 1838 he united with a Baptist church, and not long after was ordained, and began to preach regularly, without becoming the pastor of any Church, continuing also the practice of his profession. Subsequently he became pastor of Clark's Neck and Hamilton churches, and continued in this office until his death, May 8, 1862. In both his professions Dr. Christian was popular, and highly esteemed in the region in which he lived. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 222. (J. C. S.)

Christian, William, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Virginia. In 1858 he was ordained deacon, and priest the next year. He was assistant in Ascension Church, Washington city, D. C.; rector of All-Saints Church, Calvert, Md.; and rector of St. Alban's parish, D. C. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. April, 1865, p. 140.

Christian Association is the designation under which eight congregations appear in the British census of the year 1851. They acknowledge simply an adherence to the great principles of Christianity.

Christian Commission, THE UNITED STATES, was a philanthropic organization of the Northern States during the late civil war, suggested by Mr. Vincent Colyer, of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York, and instituted by that body, Nov. 14, 1861. Its object was to supplement the National Sanitary Commission, and more especially to care for the religious wants of the soldiers. The sick and wounded were personally visited, relief afforded, Christian counsel and comfort bestowed, and devotional books distributed. The amount contributed for this purpose was, in the aggregate, about $2,750,000, besides the value of voluntary offerings in supplies of various kinds, and reading-matter furnished. The work closed Feb. 11, 1866. See Moss, Annals of the United States Christian Commission (Phila. 1863). See YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

Christian Connection. See CHRISTIANS.

Christian-Meier, FRIEDRICH, a German Jewish convert of the 18th century, is the author of Guldener Leuchter alten Testaments auf Christi Geburt (Hamburg, 1718):—Balsam des Lebens. Ueber die Ceremonien der Juden (Brunswick, 1719, 1721):—תפארת משיח, or Herrliche Eigenschaften des Messias (Halle-Magdeburg, 1718):—Davidisches Blümlein aus dem 91 Psalm (Jena, 1715). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 177 sq. (B. P.)

Christian Name is a name given to children at baptism to remind them of their solemn profession of that worthy name by which they are called. A similar custom prevailed at circumcision—the analogous Jewish rite. Clement I required candidates for baptism to go to their priest, give in their names, and then be taught the mysteries. Heathen names were prohibited, and those of apostles or saints usually adopted as memorials and examples of godly living. This spiritual name was entered in the baptismal register. In case of an immodest or uncomely name being given in baptism, the bishop at confirmation might alter it, by Peckham's Constitutions. In 1549 the bishop mentioned the Christian name of the candidate at confirmation. See NAMES, CHRISTIAN.

Christian Union Churches is the title assumed by a body of Christians who were represented by a convention at Columbus, O., in 1863, and whose organization was effected in 1865. Their fundamental principles, as officially stated by themselves, are: (1) The unity of the Church; (2) Christ its only Head; (3) the Bible the sole rule of faith and practice; (4) "Good Fruits" the one condition of membership; (5) the avoidance of all controversy; (6) self-government of each local Church; (7) no partisan politics to be preached. They hold very liberal views of Church affiliation; require no particular creed; practice baptism as a mode of admission; are open-communion; and fraternize with all evangelical Christian bodies. They are chiefly found in the Western States, where they are said to number about thirty thousand members, with a following of more than one hundred thousand. They hold state councils yearly, and a general council every fourth year. One newspaper, The Christian Witness, is published by them at MacArthur, O., and they have issued a number of books and tracts.

Christiāna, Saint and Virgin, of Termonde, in Flanders, went to Dickelvenna (Tielvinnum), near Ghent, that she might tranquilly devote herself to the Catholic religion, under St. Hilduardus, and died A.D. 750. Her relics were translated from Dickelvenna to Termonde about the end of the 9th century, and were enshrined with those of St. Hilduardus. She is commemorated July 26, and also on Sept. 7, the day on which her relics were translated to Termonde (Acta Sanctorum, July, vi, 311-314).

Christiani, a surname common to several converts from Judaism, of whom we mention the following:

1. FRIEDRICH ALBRECHT (originally Baruch ben-Moses), who was baptized Nov. 28, 1674, at Scraburg, was lector of Hebrew for some time at Leipsic, and edited Abraham's Commentary on the Former Prophets, with a Latin index (Leipsic, 1686):—The Book of Jonah, in Hebrew, with the Chaldee and Massora, etc. (ibid. 1688):—The Epistle to the Hebrews, in Hebrew, a translation which R. J. B. Carpoz calls Pura, Tera et Nidra (ibid. 1676):—Von dem Glauben und Aberglauben der Juden (ibid. 1705, 1713). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 178; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. i, 989; Delitzsch, Wissenschaft, Kunst und Judenthum, p. 301.

2. MORITZ WILHELM (also called Kayser), originally rabbi at Schleusingen, and baptized there in 1715, is the author of Kurze Beschreibung einer jüdischen Synagoge (Ratisbon, 1723; Bremen, 1732):—Rede zur Einladung für rabb. Studien, an inaugural address at the opening of his rabbinical lectures at Altorf, Jan. 15, 1721, and edited by J. I. Köhler, professor at Altorf in that year. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 178; Kalkar, Israel u. die Kirche, p. 104; Delitzsch, Wissenschaft, Kunst und Judenthum, p. 303.

3. PAUL (originally Joseph ben-Jacob), professor of Hebrew and rabbinical literature at Halle, is the author of, קריב ישר, or an Epistle to the Jews, in Hebrew and German (Halle, 1711):—De Eisenmengeri Judaisme Detecto (ibid.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 178; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. i, 965; Delitzsch, Wissenschaft, Kunst und Judenthum, p. 302. (B. P.)

Christiani, Christoph Johann Rudolph, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born April 15, 1761. In 1810 he was appointed pastor primaries and provost at Oldenburg, in 1813 superintendent at Eastm., and in 1814 member of consistory, pastor, and superintendent at Luneburg. He died Jan. 6, 1841, leaving Die Gewissheit unserer ewigen Fortdauer (Leipsic, 1809):—Ueber Bestimmung, Würde und Bildung Christlicher Lehrer (Schleswig, 1789). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 471; ii, 30, 76, 94, 375, 388. (B. P.)

Christiani, David, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Greifenberg, in Pomerania, Dec. 25, 1610. He studied at different universities, and was for some time professor of theology at Giessen. In 1652 he took the degree of doctor of divinity, went in 1659 as superintendent to St. Goar, but in 1681 returned again to Giessen, where he died, Feb. 13, 1688. For his writings see Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Christians. Ninety-six congregations of England and Wales, unwilling to identify themselves with any sectarian name, reported themselves in the British census of 1851 under the simple appellation, Christians. One congregation took the name of Orthodox Christians; one of New Christians; one of Primitive Christians; two of New Testament Christians; one of Original Christians; and one of United Christians.

Christiānus, Saint and Confessor, was born at the beginning of the 9th century, and is thought by some to have been abbot of the monastery of St. Germanus of Auxerre. He held the see of Auxerre thirteen years, being the thirty-seventh bishop. He was present at the Council of Tousy, which he subscribed before Abbo, perhaps as a coadjutor or successor-designate. The other councils which he attended were the three of Perrigny or Fétigny, and that of Soissons. See Gall. Christ. xii, 276.

Christianus, a Scotch prelate, was consecrated bishop of Galloway in 1154. He was one of the witnesses to the final decision given by king Henry II of England in 1177, as to the dispute between Alphonso of Castile and Sancho of Navarre. He died in 1186. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 272.

Christie (or Chrystie) is the name of a number of Scotch clergymen:

1. HENRY, of Craigtoun, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1671; was licensed to preach in 1676; presented to the living at Kinross in 1679; deprived by the privy council in 1689, for not praying for the king and queen, and other acts of disloyalty; consecrated bishop of the non-jurant Church at Dundee in 1709, and died May 5, 1718, aged sixty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 597.

2. JAMES (1), a native of Moray, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1662; was presented to the living at Kirkcowan in 1682; transferred to Kirkinner about 1686; discharged by the people about 1689; went to Ireland, and was admitted to the living at Bandony, in the diocese of Derry, and died May 13, 1718, aged about seventy-six years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 733, 736.

3. JAMES (2), took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1705; was licensed to preach in 1712; called to the living at Simprim in 1716, and ordained in 1717; had a call to Dunfermline in 1718, but it was set aside by the assembly; was transferred to Morebattle in 1725, but his admission was twice hindered by unruly mobs. His manse was destroyed by fire in January, 1727, when four volumes of the synod register were consumed. He died March 16, 1739, aged fifty-one years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 449, 465.

4. JOHN, was presented to the living at Libberton in 1758, and ordained; was transferred to Carnwath in 1760, and died Dec. 16, 1776, aged fifty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 226; ii, 317.

5. THOMAS, took his degree at the University of Edinburgh in 1670; was licensed to preach in 1672; was for some years a licentiate as schoolmaster and session clerk at Kilspindie; appointed to the living at Wigton in 1677, and transferred to Dunning in 1682. He died in January, 1686, aged about thirty-six years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 730; ii, 757.

6. WILLIAM (1), was licensed to preach in 1667; presented the same year to the living at Glenbucket, and ordained, and died in 1695. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 554.

7. WILLIAM (2), studied theology at Glasgow University; was licensed to preach in 1697; called to the living at Scone in 1698; ordained, and died before Oct. 8, 1701. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 665.

Christie, George, a Scotch Congregational minister, was born at New Mills, Keith, Banffshire, July, 1801. He was led to Christ in early life by his pious parents; joined the Church in 1821; offered his services to the London Missionary Society; received a preparation for the work at the Mission Academy, Hoxton, and in 1830 was ordained, and sailed to Calcutta, where he spent two years in preparatory studies and labors. Soon, however, the climate began to undermine his health, and he set sail for England, stopped two years at the Cape of Good Hope, and reached his native land in 1835. In 1837 he accepted an invitation from the Church at Finchingfield, Essex; between 1844 and 1849 he was employed as travelling agent for the London Missionary Society in both England and Scotland; then he returned to mission work in South Africa, first at Philippolis, afterwards at Hankey Seminary, and finally, in 1853, at Cape Town, where he died, Nov. 24, 1870. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1872, p. 308.

Christie, John J., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born at Schraalenburg, Bergen Co., N. J., in 1781. He graduated from Columbia College in 1799; studied under Solomon Froeligh, and was licensed by the classis of Bergen in 1802. He served the Presbyterian Church of Amsterdam and Galway from 1802 to 1812, and the Reformed Church at Warwick, Orange Co., N. Y., from 1812 to 1835. He died in 1845. As a preacher he was clear, instructive, and practical; as a pastor, kind, honest, affectionate, and sincere. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church of America, 3d ed. p. 210.

Christina is the name of two early martyrs:

1. A woman of Athens, arrested along with Dionysius, and given in charge to two soldiers of the governor's train, whom she taught, and they were converted. The pair of converts therefore, with Dionysius, were tortured and stoned, and Christina, because she fell upon the corpses and wept over them, was beheaded. Such is the story in the Menology on May 15. The Latin acts, given by Ruinart, do not mention Dionysius or Christina, but seem to speak of the latter as Dionysia; nor do they mention Athens, but speak of Troas as the place where the governor is informed that Andrew, Paul, and Nicomachus are Christians.

2. A damsel of Tyre, confined by her father in a tower, that no one should see her. For throwing down idols, her father punished her in every way: plunged her in the sea, which served for a baptism, reported her to Dio, the governor, and at last she was killed. No year is given, but the day is July 24 (Mem. Basil.). Acts of this martyr, by Alphanus of Salerno (11th century), may be found in Migne (Patrol. Lat. cxlvii, 1269).

Christinus, a correspondent of Augustine (Epist. 256 [226], ii, 1070).

Christison (Christesoun, Chrystesone, etc.) is the name of several Scotch clergymen:

1. ALEXANDER (1), was presented to the living of Logiebride, with Auchtergaven, in 1621; made a claim for both stipends in 1631, which was granted, and died April 14, 1647. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 792.

2. ALEXANDER (2), son of Alexander, the professor in Edinburgh University, was educated at the high-school and university there; licensed to preach in 1820; presented the same year to the living at Foulden, and ordained in 1821. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 439, 440.

3. GEORGE, was licensed to preach in 1796; became morning lecturer in Edinburgh University till March, 1801; was presented to the living at Gargunnock in 1805, and died June 2, 1809. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 705.

4. JOHN (1), formerly a friar in the Romish Church, was outlawed in 1559 for usurping the authority of the Kirk and taking the ministry without authority. He was appointed the first minister of the Reformed faith at Fetteresso, in 1567, with two other places under his care; removed to Glenbervie about 1570; in 1574 his stipend was fixed, and he continued there in 1580. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 869, 872.

5. JOHN (2), a reader at Dunfermline to 1574, had the living at Logie in 1576, with two other parishes under his care, and continued at that place in 1608. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 712.

6. JOHN (3), took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1663; was licensed to preach in 1668; appointed to the living at Kemback in 1669, admitted in 1672; transferred to Liff in 1673; deprived by the act of parliament in 1690, restoring Presbyterian ministers; received into the government in 1694, and restored to the living, and died in April, 1703, aged about sixty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 433; iii, 710.

7. JOHN (4), took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1819; was licensed to preach in 1823; presented to the living at Biggar the same year, and ordained, and elected clerk to the presbytery in 1839, and to the synod in 1843. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 211.

8. WILLIAM, was appointed the second Protestant minister at Dundee in 1560; was a member of the first general assembly held the same year, and of the sixty succeeding assemblies he attended thirty-eight, and was elected moderator in 1569. He was presented to the vicarage of Dundee the same year; in 1574 to that of Ballumbury; in 1578 was appointed visitor to the churches; in 1589 was one of the commissioners for the defence of true religion in Forfarshire; being aged, another was appointed to supply his place in 1597. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 684.

Christlieb, Christian Wilhelm, was a German Jew (originally Lazarus Wolf) who embraced Christianity in 1733 at Burg-Farrebach, in Franconia, and wrote, Kurzer Auszug aus den ספריו oder Bussgebeten (1745):—Antwort auf Michaelis, etc. (ibid.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 179; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Christlieb, Friedrich Wilhelm, a German convert from Judaism of the 17th century, and for some time lecturer of Hebrew at Rinteln, is the author of Jerusalem in den Talmud (Cassel, 1671):—Lästerung der Juden Gegen Christum (Rinteln, 1682):—Jesus Christus, nach Kabbalistischer Art Erwiesen (ibid. 1697). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 179; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Christman, Aaron, a German Reformed minister, was born in Northampton County, Pa., June 4, 1826. He pursued his literary course at Mercersburg, and then studied theology privately for a time. In 1850 he was licensed, and ordained by the classis of Mercersburg in 1851. He afterwards passed over to the Episcopal Church, and died March 28, 1860. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 497.

Christman, Jacob, a German Reformed minister, was examined and ordained in 1798, and set over a congregation in North Carolina. In 1809 he went to Ohio, and is reported to have been the first German Reformed minister in that state. He died in 1810. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iii, 467.

Christmas. We present the following additional particulars concerning this important festival:

"Pope Julius I confirmed the birthday of our Lord to be kept on Dec. 25: and Chrysostom, in the 4th century, speaks of the feast as of great antiquity; Clement of Alexandria, in the beginning of the 3d century, speaks of it, but refers it to April 19 or 20, or May 20; and sermons of Basil and Gregory Nazianzen, preached on this day, are still extant. Epiphanius reckons it on Jan. 6, but Augustine on Dec. 25. From the West the observance of the day passed to the Eastern Church in the 4th century; as Chrysostom says, the feast was unknown at Antioch ten years before the time he was preaching, that is, probably, as kept on Dec. 25, the day hitherto observed having been Jan. 6. The Latins and Africa, and the Greek Church, generally, however, held the Nativity on Dec. 25, as appears from Jerome, Augustine, Chrysostom, Basil, and Gregory Nazianzen. The Orientals in Egypt, Cyprus, Antioch, and Palestine appear to have observed, for a time only, Jan. 6, as the feast of the Nativity and Epiphany, or Theophania, a name equally applicable to both, as Gregory Nazianzen observes. However, about the beginning of the 5th century the Nativity was commemorated, in the East, on Dec. 25, and the Epiphany on the later day. In the 6th century, beyond doubt, East and West agreed in their observance. The Basque call it the New Day, because all things are become new—old things are passed away. Christmas Eve is called, in Celtic, the Night of Mary; in Germany, the Holy Night; in Portugal, the Pasch of the Nativity; and in old English, Yule Merriment. In the Isle of Man the peasants bring tapers to church, and sing carols; and in Germany they beat with mallets on the house door, to symbolize the anxiety of the spirits in prison to learn the glad tidings of the Nativity. There were three masses on this day: one at midnight on the eve (except in the Gallican, Mozarabic, and Armenian rites), commemorating the actual birth of our Lord; the second at dawn or cock-crow, its revelation to man in the shepherds; and the third at noon, the eternal sonship of the Holy Child Jesus. Two masses were said in France in the time of Gregory of Tours; but three masses were not introduced into Spain until the 14th century, nor at Milan until the 15th century. In the Mediæval Church there was a representation of the shepherds, as at Lichfield, with a star gleaming in the chapel vault; and so lately as 1821 the Flemish preserved the same custom, and the peasants catering with sheep offered eggs and milk, while midnight mass was said at the high-altar. From the time of Augustine, midnight mass was said on the eve; and the Councils of Orleans and Toledo required all persons to attend this service at their cathedral church. The Christmas-box was a receptacle made of earthenware, in the 15th century, in which apprentices placed the rewards of their industry given them at that season."

Christmas, JOSEPH STIBBS, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Georgetown, Beaver Co., Pa., April 10, 1803. He studied at the academy in Beavertown; in 1815 entered Washington College, and, after completing his collegiate course, engaged for some time in the study of medicine. In 1820 he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, where he remained over two years. He was licensed by the Philadelphia Presbytery in April 1824, and ordained Aug. 1 by the New York Presbytery; in May following he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Montreal, and discharged his duties faithfully four years. He was afterwards agent of the American Bible Society one year, pastor of the Bowery Church, New York city, and died March 14, 1830. He wrote The Artist, a poem (1819), besides several pamphlets and contributions to periodicals. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 662.

Christolytæ were a sect mentioned by John of Damascus as teaching that when Jesus Christ arose from the dead he left his body with his soul in the earth, and that it was the divine nature alone which ascended into heaven. The name of the sect comes from this dissolution of the personality of Christ (see Joh. Damasc. Treatise on Heresies, 93, § 108; Patrol. Græc. xciv, 681).

Christophe, Jean Baptiste, pastor at Notre-Dame-de-Fontaines, near Lyons, was born at Amplepuis (Rhône), June 3, 1809. He published a Histoire de la Papauté Pendant le XIV^e Siècle (1852, 3 vols. 8vo.), a work giving an exact account, from the best sources, of the residence of the popes at Avignon. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Christophe, Joseph, a French painter, was born at Verdun in 1667, and was chosen a member of the Royal Academy in 1697. His picture of The Miraculous Feeding of the Multitude was one of the finest ornaments of Paris before the Revolution. He died at Paris, March 29, 1748. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Christopher (Χριστοφορος), Saint, a Christian martyr, lived probably about the 3d century. According to the legend, which is interesting as the basis of many popular superstitions, Christopher determined to serve only the most powerful of monarchs. He visited the court of a great prince, who was afraid of the devil, from which he concluded that the devil must be the stronger; but he noticed that the latter, to whom he offered his services, had some fear on looking at the image of Christ. Thus Christopher set himself to find one whose strength was superior to that of the devil. In his distress he went to ask advice of a hermit, who suggested to him the idea of carrying pilgrims across a torrent over which there was no bridge, and this became for a long time the daily occupation of Christopher. One day a child presented itself on the borders of the stream; Christopher took the burden upon his shoulders, thinking it easy enough, but it nearly crushed him. The child was Christ, and, in order to make himself known to Christopher, he ordered him to thrust his great stick into the earth. Christopher obeyed, and saw with astonishment, on the following morning, that the stick had been transformed into a date-tree, with fruit and leaves. Thousands of men, having been drawn near by that miracle, accepted the Christian religion; but the pagan governor of the province put Christopher in prison, and tried his faith by the most cruel tortures. He then was beaten with red-hot iron rods, and many other barbarities were inflicted upon him, but he remained unchangeable. Finally three thousand soldiers were ordered to shoot at him poisoned arrows, none of which struck him, but returned against those who had shot them. The governor himself was struck in the eye, when Christopher indicated to him the remedy by which to cure the wound: it was that, when Christopher's own head had been cut off, he should wash his eye with his blood. Christopher was beheaded. The governor was entirely cured by the blood of the martyr, and was baptized, with all his family. This saint is ordinarily represented under the figure of a giant carrying Christ on his shoulders, and leaning upon a large stick, making all efforts not to succumb under the burden. The popular belief of the Middle Ages identified the image and the name of Christ with those of St. Christopher, and it was said that "he who ever saw St. Christopher would never die an infamous death." See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Christopher is likewise the name of several early Christians:

1. One of three soldiers of Diocletian's guard, who, being converted, A.D. 269, by the constancy of St. George, suffered charring, scarification, imprisonment, and death, April 19 (Basil, Menol. iii, 63).
2. A deacon, who, with Clement, bishop of Ancyra, and Charito, the second deacon, had his throat cut (A.D. 296) in prison, Jan. 23 (Basil, Menol. ii).
3. A monk at Jerusalem, who testified to the superiority of the common life over the solitary condition of a hermitage (Migne, Patrol. lxxiv, 170).
4. Bishop of Arcadiopolis in Asia, at the second council of Constantinople, A.D. 553 (Labbe, Concil. v, 582).
5. A Sabaita, martyr in Palestine under the Saracens (April 14), in the 8th century (Migne, Dict. Haglog. s. v.).
6. Dean ("primicier") and counsellor of the see of Rome, who, with his son Sergius, treasurer of the Roman Church, obtained armed assistance from Desiderius, king of Lombardy, to dislodge the antipope Constantine. Christopher opposed the intrusion of Philip, and procured the election of Stephen III. He attempted to induce Desiderius to restore the Church property which he had plundered; the king was exasperated, and so used his influence at Rome that the eyes of Christopher and Sergius were torn out, which in three days caused the death of the former, cir. A.D. 775 (Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs, xii, 1117).

Antique Representation of St. Christopher.

7. Patriarch of Alexandria (A.D. 804-837), who wrote a "synodical" letter to the emperor Theophilus, the iconoclast, in favor of the worship of images, citing the story of king Abgarus. It was signed by fourteen hundred and fifty-five bishops and priests. He wrote De Vita Humana (Paris, 1608), under the name of Theophilus Alexandr. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 23).

8. "Patricius, patriâ Mitylenæus," a menologist, author of an iambic Historia Sanctorum, beginning with September and ending with August. He is included by Cave, Hist. Lit. (Dissert. i), among writers of uncertain date.

Christopher (Christophen, or Christophorus), Joseph, a reputable Dutch painter, was born at Utrecht in 1498, and studied in the school of Anthony More. He was invited to the court of Lisbon by John III, where he executed a number of fine works for the churches.

Christopher, Ralph G., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Halifax County, Va., Oct. 10, 1787. He was converted in 1809, licensed to preach in 1810, and admitted into the South Carolina Conference. About 1820 he located and practiced medicine. In 1823 he removed to Alabama, continued his medical profession until 1831, and then entered the Alabama Conference, wherein he labored as health permitted until his death, Oct. 13, 1839. Mr. Christopher was a man of great faith and resignation under many afflictions. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1840, p. 58.

Christopher, Thomas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Cambridge, Dorchester Co., Md., Jan. 12, 1805. He was converted at the age of twelve; in 1834 entered the Philadelphia Conference, and afterwards became a member of the New Jersey Conference. In all he labored fifteen years as an itinerant, and died at his post, in January, 1850. As a man, Mr. Christopher was candid, companionable, and interesting; as a Christian, warm, sincere, practical; as a preacher, faithful, earnest, useful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1850, p. 436.

Christopher, William Britton, a Congregational minister, was born at Binghamton, N. Y., Aug. 15, 1817. He attended Syracuse Academy; graduated at Union College in 1847; in 1848 was a member of Princeton Theological Seminary, and the following year was connected with Auburn Theological Seminary. He was ordained at Centre Lisle, N. Y., as an evangelist, Oct. 16, 1849, and during the succeeding year was acting pastor at Union Centre; the two following years preached in Hancock; from 1852 to 1854, served the Presbyterian churches in Oneonta and Otego; from January, 1854, to September, 1859, in Lacon, Ill.; in 1860, at Galena; the following year acting pastor of the Congregational Church in the same place. From April, 1864, until 1867 he was pastor in Mendota. During the succeeding four years he was employed as a farmer in Iowa. Meantime, from 1866 to 1870, he was editor of the National Prohibitionist of Chicago. As the leader of a prohibition colony, he went to Cheever, Kansas, in 1871. He died at Binghamton, Nov. 7, 1879. Mr. Christopher was a man of excellent qualities, an earnest preacher of the gospel, and a zealous temperance leader. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1880, p. 39; Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 15.

Christopherson, JOHN, a learned English prelate, was born in Lancashire, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He was one of the first fellows of Trinity College after its foundation by Henry VIII, in 1546, and soon after became master of it. He was banished in the reign of Edward VI, but, when queen Mary succeeded to the crown, he returned, was made dean of Norwich in 1554, and bishop of Chichester in 1557. He died in December, 1558. He translated Philo Judeus into Latin (Antwerp, 1553, 4to); also the ecclesiastical histories of Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, Evagrius, and Theodoret (Louvain, 1570, 8vo; Cologne, 1570, fol.). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Christophorus, ANGELUS, a Greek writer, was born in the Peloponnesus about 1575. On account of the atrocities of the Turkish government he went to Europe, and settled in England, studying at Cambridge and Oxford. In 1619 he published in Greek, with a Latin translation, a work On the Present State of the Greek Church, which was republished by the Protestant George Phelavius in 1655, at Frankfurt, with a new Latin translation and notes; again reprinted in Greek and Latin (Leipsic, 1876). Christophorus also wrote, De suis Tribulationibus: — Explicatio Symboli: — Explanatio Sacrorum Mysteriorum: — De Apostasia Ecclesie et Homine Peccatore (Greek and Latin; Lond. 1614). See Fabricii Bibl. Gr. xi; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Christotōkos. See NESTORIUS.

Christovão (of Lisbon), FREY, a Portuguese missionary, the first explorer of the river Tocantins, in Brazil, was born of a noble family near the close of the 16th century. In 1623 he was appointed guardian of the Capuchin convent at Maramhão. He opposed, with all his influence, the reduction of the Indians to slavery, and then undertook to teach them. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chrodebert I (otherwise Rigobert, or Zero-bert), archbishop of Tours. The Chronicon Thuronense makes him the prelate who granted to St. Martin's Abbey at Tours privileges confirmed by pope Adeodatus (672-676).

Chrodebert II (otherwise known as Ruotbertus, Crabertus, and Erabertus), archbishop of Tours, is said to have taken monastic vows A.D. 662. He is distinguished for a judgment which he wrote concerning a woman who had committed fornication after she had joined a religious order. The document was suppressed for two reasons: first, because Chrodebert, who wrote about the middle of the 7th century, says in it that they did not then acknowledge in France more than the first four general councils, viz., Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon. The other reason was because he maintained that Mary Magdalene merited the appearance of the Saviour after his resurrection, before that privilege was accorded to the apostles, or even to his mother. His letter is to be found in the 54th volume of Migne's Latine Patrology, among the notes of Quesnel on the Epistles of Leo the Great. See Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. iii, 578.

Chrodielidis, a nun of the convent of the Holy Cross at Poitiers. She incited a rebellion in the nunnery, and was excommunicated at the Council of Poitiers, A.D. 590, but was afterwards restored to the communion.

Chrodogandus. See CHRODEGANG.

Chronan. See CRONAN.

Chronica (Χρονικά) were histories or epitomes of history, in which special care was taken to fix the date of each event recorded.

CHRONICA HOROSII is in substance the chronicle of Hippolytus, but with an appended note bringing the chronology to the writer's time. See CHRONICON CANISIANUM.

Chronicon ATHANASII. The Festal Epistles of Athanasius, published in Syriac by Cureton, 1848, and afterwards with a Latin translation by Mai (Pat. Nov. Bibl. vi), have prefixed a chronicle of the episcopate of Athanasius (A.D. 328-373). It throws much light on the history of the period, marking the Easter of each year, together with the names of its consuls and the other modes of designating the year, both in the east and west.

CHRONICON CANISIANUM (Labbeanum or Hippolyti). This chronicle was published first by Canisius, in 1602. It is anonymous, and in Latin, but internal evidence shows it is a translation from the Greek. It can scarcely be called a chronicle, for it contains no continuous history. It merely gives from the Old Test. a series of names and dates sufficient for the purposes of chronological computation.

CHRONICON CYPRIANICUM is a short treatise appended to the works of St. Cyprian. This is probably the "very useful chronicle" which Paulus Diaconus, in his Life of St. Cyprian, says that father composed.

CHRONICON EDESSENUM is an anonymous Syriac chronicle, published by Assemani (Bibl. Orient. i, 367), apparently compiled about A.D. 550. The writer was orthodox, and expressly recognises the first four general councils, though one doubtful passage has brought him under suspicion of Pelagianism (p. 402). He places the birth of Christ two years before the vulgar computation.

CHRONICON PASCHALE (or Alexandrinum) is an anonymous epitome of the world's history from the creation to the twentieth year of the reign of Heraclius.

A.D. 630. A MS. of the 10th century, which was found in a Sicilian library in the middle of the 16th century, is now in the Vatican library. The question as to what day of the lunar month it was on which our Saviour suffered is elaborately discussed, and a chronological table of the main events of our Lord's life is given. The author's dates correspond to B.C. 3 for the birth, and A.D. 32 for the crucifixion of Christ. This chronicle is the subject of a special essay by Van der Hagen (Amst. 1736), where will be found the best explanations of those points in the chronicler's method of computation which present difficulty.

CHRONICON RUINARTIÆNUM is a short Latin chronicle appended to two MSS. of Victor Vitensis, and consists chiefly of extracts from other writers. It begins with the reign of Arcadius and Honorius, and goes to that of Justin II (565-578). It makes mention of the dialogues of pope Gregory the Great, and was probably compiled about the end of the 6th century.

CHRONICON SCALIGERIÆNUM (or Alexandrinum). Scaliger published this as an appendix to his edition of the Chronicon of Eusebius. The chronicle begins with Adam, and ends with the reign of Arcadius and Honorius. Internal evidence points to Alexandria as the place of its composition. Notwithstanding the blunders in its Greek translations, the use made by the compiler of writings not now extant renders it worthy of being consulted. He appears to have taken from apocryphal sources stories of the martyrdom of Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, and of the miraculous preservation of Elizabeth and her infant, of the names of the wise men, etc.

CHRONICON VALESIIANUM. This fragment of a chronicle by an unknown author, embracing the period from Diocletian to Theodoric, is in Latin. It was published by Valesius as an appendix to his edition of Amnianus Marcellinus.

Chronitæ (from χρόνος, time) is a term of reproach applied by the Arians of the 4th century to the orthodox Christians of the period, by which they designed to intimate that their opponents' religion was only temporary, and would speedily have an end.

Chronogram consists of words in an inscription, so placed that the numeral letters give the date of a certain event thus recorded. The earliest instance occurs in stained glass, cir. 1062, at St. Peter's, Aix. There is another, of the time of Charles I, on the ceiling of the lantern in Winchester. The only letters which can be used are M, D, C, I, X, V, I.

Chronopius was a bishop of the time of Valentinian I, mentioned in his law of July 9, A.D. 369. His see is unknown; but, contrary to the laws, he had applied to a secular magistrate, Claudianus, and again to another, against the decisions of a certain council, and for this he was deposed.

Chronopius I was third bishop of Le Périgord. He succeeded Anianus in the first half of the 4th century.

Chronopius II was the seventh bishop of Le Périgord. He is described as having been of noble birth, modest, gentle, eloquent, the father of the poor, the prop of his country, the restorer of churches, the redeemer of citizens. He died about the middle of the 6th century (Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxxxviii, 160; Gall. Christ. ii, 1450).

Chronus (time) was the Greek name of SATURN.

Chrotbertus. See CHRODEBERT.

Chrotechildis (or Chrotildis). See CLOTILDA.

Chrworsch, in Slavonic mythology, was a god of the destructive wind-storm, to whom the Slavs offered sacrifices to shield them from his power.

Chrysander (properly Goldman), WILHELM CHRISTIAN JUSTUS, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 9, 1718, at Gödekenroda, in the vicinity of Halberstadt. He studied at Halle and Helmstädt, and in 1742 was permitted to lecture. In 1744 he was made pastor of St. Stephen's, at Helmstädt, lecturing, at the same time, on Oriental languages and literature. In 1750 he was called to Rinteln, became in 1751 doctor of theology, and in 1755 professor ordinarius of theology. In 1758 he was called as first professor of theology and philology to Kiel, and died Dec. 10, 1788. He was a voluminous writer. Döring (Die Gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 247 sq.) gives on five pages the titles of his one hundred and one publications. See also Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 179; Steinschneider, Bibliographisches Handbuch, p. 35; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 857; Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Chrysanthus was the name of several early Christians:

1. Martyred along with the virgin Daria at Rome, under Numerianus, A.D. 283. He is commemorated Dec. 1 in Usuard's Mart., and March 19 in the Byzantine Calendar.

2. A bishop of the Novatians at Constantinople, who succeeded Sisinnius in 407. Being disinclined to accept the episcopal office, he retired from Constantinople to Bithynia, but was pursued, drawn from his retreat, and forced to submit to ordination. He died in 414.

3. One of the bishops at the Council of Arles in the early part of the 5th century.

4. Bishop of Spoleto, addressed by Gregory the Great (Epist. vii, 72, 73) and begged to give some relics of Sabinus for a church at Fermo.

Chrysaphius was a eunuch, chief minister at the court of Theodosius II, the Eastern emperor. He is mentioned as gaining over his master and the empress Eudoxia to the party of Eutyches. After the death of Theodosius, A.D. 450, he was disgraced, banished to an island, and put to death at the instance of the empress Pulcheria. It is thought that through the influence of Chrysaphius, Eutyches obtained a letter from Theodosius to Leo the Great, exhorting him to peace. Chrysaphius and Eudoxia also supported Dioscorus in his desire that Theodosius would summon the Eutychian Council of Ephesus (Theodoret, Epist. 124, 125).

Chrysè (in Latin versions of the story known as Aurea) is the principal figure in the account of the martyrdom of Hippolytus. It purports to relate to martyrdoms which took place during a violent persecution of the Christians by the emperor Claudius. There are many versions of this story. The most complete discussion of all these stories is to be found in Döllinger, Hippolytus und Kallistus, chap. 2.

Chrysèros was a sophist and apologist of paganism in the 5th century, rebuked by St. Nilus (Epist. ii, 42; see Ceillier, viii, 217).

Chrysippus of CAPPADOCIA, an ecclesiastical writer, lived in the 5th century, according to Cyril of Scythopolis (Vit. St. Euthym.). He and two of his brothers, Cosmos and Gabriel, received a good education in Syria, and were then given into the care of Euthymius at Jerusalem. In that place, also, Chrysippus took orders. In 455 he became steward of the monastery, and subsequently præfect of the Church of the Resurrection, and "guardian of the holy Cross," filling the latter place for ten years, till his death. He wrote, in a style both elegant and concise, some works on ecclesiastical subjects; but they are lost, except a treatise, entitled Homilia de Sancta Deipara (also found with a Latin translation in the second volume of the Auctarium Patr. Paris, 1624), and some fragments of a small work, entitled Encomium Theodori Martyris (in Eustathius of Constantinople's Liber de Statu Vitæ Functorum). A Laudatio Joannis Baptistæ, attributed to Chrysippus, is printed in Latin by Combefis (Biblioth. Concionat. vii, 108). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. See COSMOS.

Chrysobergus, Lucas, a Greek ecclesiastical writer, was appointed patriarch of Constantinople in 1155. He presided over the synod which was held there in 1166, and died in 1167. Of his works there are left but thirteen Decreta Synodalia (contained in the Jus Græco-romanum of Leunclavius), and the following are the titles of some of the decrees recorded by him: De Clericis qui se Immiscent Sæcularibus Negotiis; De Indecoris et Scenicis Ritibus Sanctorum Notariorum Festo Abrogandis; Ne Clerici Turpilucrisant aut Medici. There are in the imperial library of Vienna two poems, which are attributed to Chrysobergus. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chrysobergus, Maximus, a Greek ecclesiastical writer, who lived about 1400, wrote, Oratio de Processione Spiritus Sancti (printed in the second volume of Græcia Orthodoxa, by Leo Allatius). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chrysogonus was the name of two early Christians:

1. A martyr at Rome, under Diocletian, commemorated Nov. 24, in the Hieronymian martyrology, old Roman, and those of Bede and Usuard. Some MSS. of the Hieronymian martyrology give Aquileia as the place of martyrdom.

2. A monk of Aquileia to whom Jerome writes (Epist. 9, ed. Vall.) from the desert, asking him to write to him.

Chrysosius (Chryseuil), St., bishop and martyr, is celebrated at Comines, in Flanders, as the apostle of that neighborhood. He suffered under Diocletian A.D. 302, and is commemorated on Feb. 7.

Chrysoloras, DEMETRIUS, a Greek theologian, was born at Thessalonica, and lived in the 14th century. He was recommended by John Cantacuzenus to the emperor Manuel, when he was charged by that prince with important missions to foreign courts. In the Bodleian Library, and in the National Library of Paris, there are about one hundred MS. letters of Chrysoloras to the emperor Manuel. Chrysoloras also wrote several treatises about religious subjects, of which the most important ones are: Dialogus adversus Demetrium Cydonium;—Dialogus contra Latinos;—Encomium in S. Demetrium Martyrem;—Tractatus ex Libris Nili contra Latinos de Processione Spiritus Sancti;—Epistola ad Barlaamum de Processione Spiritus Sancti. All these writings are translated, possibly by Barlaam himself, and, with a refutation, are found in the Bibliotheca Patrum Colonienis. A great many more still exist in European libraries. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Chrysophōra was a correspondent of Dionysius of Corinth, "a most faithful sister" (Euseb. iv, 23). The letter is not extant.

Chrysor, in Phœnician mythology, was a hero belonging to the seventh generation of the deities. He benefited mankind by various inventions: the canoe, bait, fishing-hook, the art of piloting, and the working of iron by fire. He was also worshipped under the name Diamichios.

Chrysorêtēs was chamberlain of Theodosius II (who reigned A.D. 408-450). He was exceedingly influential, and opposed to the Catholic party (Tillemont, xi, 527). See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Chrystal, JAMES, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1829; presented to the living at Auchinleck in 1833; and had a son, James R., who was minister at Cultra. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 97.

Chrystie. See CHRISTIE.

Chubarag, in the Lamaian religion, is the name of the clergy. The Lamaian priests of the Mongolians are called Gellongs.

Chubbuck, FRANCIS E. R., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was chaplain of a regiment of Massachusetts volunteers at the beginning of his ministry in 1862; soon after removed to New Orleans; in 1865 became rector of Trinity Church, Vineland, N. J.; in 1867 held this rectorship and also officiated at Melville; and soon after was rector of St. Peter's Church, Clarksborough, where he remained until his death, Jan. 2, 1872. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1873, p. 133.

Chubilgataš, in Mongolian religion, are those spirits that descend from heaven to take possession of a child at its birth.

Chum, THOMAS, a learned layman of the 17th century, who lived at Alfriston, Sussex, published in 1635 a small manual entitled Collections Theologicarum Conclusionum. Some have much opposed it, although they commend the brevity and clearness of his positions, and others welcomed it from a layman at once able and industrious in theological learning. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 258.

Chumba Version of the Scriptures. Chumba is a dialect spoken by about 120,000 people. Chumba is an independent hill state between Dalhousie and Cashmere. An edition of St. Matthew and St. John, in the Chumba and in the Thakuri dialect, which is the medium of communication among the people, was published by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1899. Chung-tien-cho, in Chinese mythology, is the name of the birthplace of the god Fo or Fo-hi, where true virtue and pure joy dwell. It is believed to have been northern India or Bengal.

Chunialdus, Saint, presbyter of Salzburg, lived about the middle of the 8th century, and is commemorated Sept. 24.

Church. We give some additional details respecting the church edifices:

"The earliest Church property, so called, dates from the reign of Alexander Severus, 222-235. Optatus of Milevi mentions forty churches at Rome. From the time of Gallienus (260) to the edict of Diocletian for their destruction, in 303, the Christians had their meet; and the Acts of St. Theodotus of Ancyra, martyred by the emperor, allude to an apsidal church. The original Christian churches were oblong, looking eastward, with the chambers of the clergy on either side, and two western doors as separate entrances for men and women. Afterwards churches were built in various forms—in the shape of a cross, square, or round: the former were vaulted, and the latter had wooden ceilings. All were apsidal, and their orientation is called by Paganus 'the more usual form'; but Stephen, bishop of Tournay, speaks of it as a peculiarity of St. Benedict's, Paris, in a letter to pope Lucius III, and in some Italian churches at his day, the celebrant at the altar faced the west. About the year 1000—the fancied millennium of some ancient writers—architecture came nearly to a standstill. Churches were not repaired, much less rebuilt; for, as William of Tyre said, the evening of days seemed to have fallen upon the world, and the coming of the Son of Man to draw near; while charters of foundation, rare as they were, bore the ominous head-words: 'forasmuch as the world's end approacheth.' But about the beginning of the 11th century confidence was restored, and an era of church building so universal set in that Ralph Glaber says it seemed as if 'the world was putting off its dingy vesture and donning a pure white robe.'

"Churches, in their threefold longitudinal division of nave, choir, and sanctuary, correspond to the arrangement of the Temple, with its court of the Gentiles, the worldly sanctuary, and holy of holies. They have also a triple elevation, containing the base-arcade, triforium, and clerestory, and also three parts laterally formed by the main body of the structure and its aisles.

"Churches are distinguished into various grades, the patriarchal, primatial, and metropolitan, according to the rank of their presidents: cathedral, as containing a bishop's cathedra or see; collegiate, which are composed of a chapter and dean; conventual, if belonging to a religious community; abbey, those under an abbot, or priories, if governed by a prior; minsters, when attached to a monastery or of imposing size; parochial, if furnished with a font."

"Churches are built on many different plans, and have been so at all periods: one plan has no more authority than another—it is entirely a matter of convenience and decent order. The earliest churches were chambers in the houses of the more wealthy Christians, who allowed their poorer brethren to assemble in their houses, usually in the hall or the largest room, but at first in smaller rooms, either at the top of the house, as mentioned in the book of the Acts of the Apostles, or in the chambers below the level of the street, which were usual in the houses or palaces of the Roman nobility. Several of these subterranean churches remain, as those of St. Pudenciana and St. Sylvester. In all these cases other chambers were built above them for churches after the peace in the time of Constantine. Some think that the name of basilica was derived from this early use of the hall, which was also a court of justice (see BASILICA); and in the case of the Cathedral of Treves the actual hall of a Roman house remains to this day, converted into a church, while there is another basilica, or law court, near to it, also converted into a church in more recent times.

At Rome the seven great churches made by Constantine, which still retain the name of basilica in an especial manner, were probably all originally law courts, and so preserved their old arrangements, which served as types for others, and came to be considered the usual arrangement of a church.

"The Church of Santa Croce was the pretorium, or law court, in the sessorium or palace of the empress Helena, and had an apse added to it by Constantine as a necessary part of the arrangement. That of St. John Lateran, which was the first that Constantine made into a church, was originally one of the halls in the great palace of the Lateran family. Those of St. Lawrence and St. Agnes were originally two of the small burial-chapels at the entrance of their respective catacombs, and other chapels in the catacombs are called basilicas by some writers, though they seldom held more than fifty persons, and the largest not more than eighty; these are evidently burial-chapels only, and afford no guidance for the arrangement of a church. St. Clement's is usually appealed to as the primitive type; the original church, which now forms a crypt to the present one, is considerably wider. When the upper part of the church was rebuilt, in the 12th century, the old nave of the upper church was found inconveniently wide, and one of the aisles of this underground church is now outside the wall of the upper church, the width of the nave having been divided into a nave and aisle. The marble screen was brought up from the lower church and re-arranged to suit the smaller one. This church therefore affords no certain type of primitive arrangement. That of Torcello, at Venice, is more perfect and unaltered, but is probably also of the 12th century. There is no example of primitive arrangement remaining, except perhaps St. Agnes, outside of the walls of Rome; but it is certain that the plan of the Roman court of justice was closely followed, and all the names of the different parts were retained.

"When the art of building in stone was revived in Western Europe in the 11th century, the apse appears at first to have been considered an essential feature, as at Canterbury, which seems to have followed the plan of the original church of St. Peter's at Rome; and in such cases the altar was probably placed on the chord of the apse, as at Rome, but this practice was soon abandoned, and from the 12th century in England the square east end became almost universal, and the altar was placed against the east wall, often resting partly upon corbels in the wall. The chorus, or choir, which in Italy is sometimes in one part of the church and sometimes another, and in Spain and the south of France is usually in the middle, was in England and the north of France almost universally in the eastern limb of the church, and enclosed by a screen called originally cancellus, from which the name of chancel and choir became synonymous, but usage now generally confines the name of choir to the cathedrals or large churches. See CHANCEL; CHOIR. When there are aisles to the eastern part of a church the central division of it is usually called the choir. Although no general rule can be laid down, the most usual plan of our English mediæval church may be said to be: 1. A chancel without aisles; 2. A nave with aisles; 3. A western tower; 4. A south porch.

"Garsington Church, Oxfordshire, affords a good example of the original plan of a parish church unaltered."

Church, Aaron, a Congregational minister, graduated in 1765 from Yale College; was settled as pastor in Hartland, Conn., in 1780; resigned in 1814, and died in 1823. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 383.

Church, Aaron B., a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1798. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1822, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1825; was ordained June 21, 1826; was pastor at Calais, Me., from 1828 to 1834; stated supply of the Presbyterian Church at Princeton, Ill., from 1849 to 1853, and died there, April 23, 1857. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 63.

Church, Alonzo, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Brattleboro', Vt., April 9, 1793. He was educated at Middlebury College, studied theology privately, and was licensed by Hopewell Presbytery in 1820. He never had any pastoral charge, but preached often in Atlanta, Ga., and was for thirty years president of Georgia University, resigning in 1859. He died at his residence in Atlanta, May 18, 1862. He was a man of sterling worth and ardent piety, and an excellent teacher. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 851.

Church, Selden, a Unitarian minister, was born at East Haddam, Conn., graduated at Yale College in 1765, and was settled as pastor in Campton, N. H., in October, 1774. He was dismissed the same year, and died in 1802. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 192.

Church-ales is a name for festivals at which the benefactions of the people at their sports and pastimes being collected, were devoted to recast the bells, repair towers, beautify churches, and raise funds for the poor.

Church-books were divided into several classes. There were six reading-books: the Bibliotheca, a collection of the books of the Bible by St. Jerome; the Homilar, the homilies used on Sundays and certain festivals; the Passionar, containing the acts of martyrs; the Legendary, an account of confessors; the Lectiary, the epistles of St. Paul; and the Sermologus, sermons of the popes and fathers, read on certain days. The song and ritual books are mentioned under their titles. It was the custom till recent years for women-servants to carry their church books in a clean white handkerchief, a relic of the old custom in the Western Church for women to receive the eucharist in a linen cloth. To this day the altar-rail at Wimborne Minster is covered at the time of holy communion with a white cloth.

Churchill, Charles, an English clergyman and poet, was born in the parish of St. John the Evangelist, Westminster, in February, 1731. He was educated at Westminster School, and admitted to Trinity College, Cambridge, but left immediately and never returned. He was ordained priest in 1756, and then exercised his clerical functions at Cadbury, Somersetshire, and at Rainham, in Essex, his father's living. At the death of his father, in 1758, he succeeded him in the curacy and lectureship of St. John's. In a short time, however, he forsook all external decency, appearing, to the amazement of the town, in a blue coat, ruffles, and a gold-laced hat. Being remonstrated with by the dean of Westminster for various irregularities, he resigned his preferments, and treated his clerical office with utter contempt. He now lived a profligate life, and devoted his talents to poetry, for which he had unquestionable genius. He died Nov. 4, 1764. For particulars of his career and writings see Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Churchill, James, an English Congregational minister, was born at Portsea, Oct. 7, 1766. He was converted when about nineteen years old, and admitted, in February, 1789, to Homerton College, where he remained till 1795. He became pastor at Ongar, Essex, in February, 1796; removed to Henley-upon-Thames in 1807, and in 1813 to Thames Ditton, where he labored till 1844, when he resigned his charge. He died March 8, 1849. Mr. Churchill was distinguished for purity of character, fidelity in pastoral work, and success in winning souls. See (Lond.) Evangelical Magazine, 1849, p. 589.

Churchill, John, a Congregational minister, was born at Litchfield, Conn., Feb. 15, 1811. For a short time he attended Amherst College, and then, from 1833 to 1835, studied medicine at Yale College. In 1839 he graduated from Yale Divinity School. From April 22, 1840, he was pastor of the North Congregational Church in Woodbury, Conn., resigned in 1867, but was not regularly dismissed until June, 1869. From 1869 to 1876 he was acting pastor in Oxford, and then returned to Woodbury, where he resided without charge. He was a Representative from Woodbury, in 1867 and 1868, in the Connecticut legislature. His death occurred Dec. 29, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 19.

Churchman, John, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Nottingham, Cheshire County, Pa., June 4, 1705. He became an established Christian when about twenty, and was "recommended," in the winter of 1735-36, as a preacher. For the next two or three years he exercised his ministry in Pennsylvania, Maryland, New Jersey, Virginia, and New England. From 1750 to 1754 he was engaged in ministerial work in Great Britain, Ireland, and Holland. In the French and Indian war he often raised his voice in favor of a peaceful and conciliatory attitude towards the natives. His death took place July 24, 1775. He left a very full journal of his labors during all these years of his ministry. See Friend's Library, v, 176-265. (J. C. S.)

Church-rates are an assessment made upon the inhabitants of any parish in England for meeting the expenses of repairing the parish church. The rate must be agreed upon at a meeting of the churchwardens and parishioners, regularly called by public notice, but if none of the parishioners appear, the wardens alone make the rate. Houses, as well as lands, are chargeable with rates, and in cities and large towns houses alone are rated. A rate for repairing the church is charged upon the real estate, while a rate for providing ornaments is charged upon the goods or personal property. The rector is held to all charges for repairing the chancel, and is exempt from any rate for repairs on the church in general, except when he holds lands within the parish not belonging to the rectory. Church-rates have long been unpopular in England, and cannot be raised at the mere instance of the bishop; the consent of the parishioners is required.

Church-reeves (from greesfa, a steward) are church-wardens, officers chosen to maintain order during divine service and as trustees of the church goods and furniture. In Spain they are called operarii, and in France marguilliers (meriglerii), from the nurel, or token of lead, which was given by them to the priests who attended service, as a qualification for receiving payment. They appear as melingerii at Cefalu, Catania, and Monte Regale.

Church-yards. The dead were not buried, in the earlier times, in the outer court of the church, but examples of the practice occur in the 4th century, and after the 6th century it became general. The first recorded instance of a formal consecration of a church-yard occurs in the writings of Gregory of Tours, in the 6th century. The church-yard, under the name of atrium, is first mentioned with the garden near the church in 740, in the Excerptions of Egbright. Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, is said to have introduced the use of church-yards as burial-places into England. So lately as 1791, the burial-yard of the cathedral only was used at Hereford. Fairs and markets were prohibited in church-yards by act of Parliament in 1285, and another act of Henry VI proscribed the former in them on Sundays; but at the period of the Reformation they were often profaned by the revellings of summer lords in May, and by mummers in winter-time, and noisy revels and banquets were held under tents in them. The indecent practice was at length suppressed, and in 1623 the privilege of sanctuary was taken from church-yards. See CEMETERY.

Churen, in Hindû mythology, was a giant, and king of the evil demons. He was besieged by Kartikeya, the twelve-handed and six-headed son of Shiva, and the two sisters Uma and Ganga, and afterwards married Indra's daughter Denanei.

Churillo. See KASCZEJ.

Churmustu-Taŋgri, in Lamaian mythology, is the great protecting spirit of the earth, a giant-like, heavenly being, who rides on the middle head of the three-headed elephant, Gasar Sakikjin Kowen.

Chutriel, in Talmudic mythology, is the name of one of the devils who is occupied in scourging the damned.

Chylmarke (Lat. Chilmarcius), JOHN, an English philosopher, who flourished in 1390, was born at Chylmark, Wiltshire; educated at Merton College, Oxford; became a diligent searcher into the mysteries of nature; an acute thinker and disputant; but most remarkable for his skill in mathematics, being the author of many treatises in that science. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 334.

Chynoweth, JOHN, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at St. Agnes, Cornwall, May 20, 1849. He was converted at eighteen, and entered the ministry in 1875. His last appointment was to the Bodwin Circuit in 1880. He died Oct. 24, 1881. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1882, p. 15.

Cia-chy-sa-sgi, in Lamaism, is one of the sixteen regions of hell, or of the kingdom of evil demons (the kingdom is called Gnielva). It lies in the district where the damned are tormented by fire. Here the floor is made of red-hot iron, and the lost are obliged to stand with their bare feet on it. The other half of this kingdom is equally unendurable on account of its cold.

Claconius. See CHACON.

Ciaffoni, BERNARDO, an Italian theologian of the Franciscan order, was a native of San Elpidio, and died in 1604, leaving Apologia in Favore de Santi Padri (Turin, s. a.; Avignon, 1698). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ciakelak, an Armenian lexicographer, and monk of the monastery of the Isle of San Lazzaro, near Venice, was born in 1771 at Ghiumuskana, and died in January, 1835. He occupied himself mostly with the study of languages, the fruit of which was the publication of Preces S. Nierres, Armeniorum Patriarchæ, in fourteen languages. His principal works are, an Italian-Armenian Dictionary (printed in the monastery of San Lazzaro, 1804):—The Death of Abel, transl. from the German into the Armenian (Venice, 1825):—The Adventures of Telemachus (transl. into Armenian, 1826, 8vo). He left also several MS. works, in prose and verse, which are still in the monastery of San Lazzaro. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cialdieri, GIROLAMO, a painter of Urbino, was born about 1593, and studied under Ridolfi. Several of his works are in Roman churches, the best of which is the Decollation of St. John, in San Bartolommeo.

Ciamberlano (or Ciamberlani), LUCA, an Italian painter and engraver, was born at Urbino, in 1586, labored from 1603 to 1640, and died at Rome in 1641. The following are some of his principal works: thirteen plates of Christ and the Twelve Apostles; St. Jerome Dead, Lying upon a Stone; Christ on the Mount of Olives; Christ Appearing to Mary Magdalene; Christ Appearing to St. Theresa. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ciampelli, AGOSTINO, an eminent Florentine painter and architect, was born in 1578, studied under Santo di Titi, and died at Rome in 1640. In San Stephano di Pescia is his celebrated picture of The Visit of the Virgin with Elisabeth; also, in Santa Prassede, The Crucifixion. Two of his finest works in fresco are in the Chiesa del Gesu, representing the Martyrdom of St. Andrew, and a Glory of Saints and Angels on the ceiling. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ciampini (Lat. Ciampinus), GIOVANNI GIUSTINO, an Italian historian, was born at Rome, April (or Aug.) 13, 1633, studied law, but devoted himself to antiquities, enjoyed several offices at the pontifical court, founded a scientific school, and died July 12, 1698. He wrote, De Duobus Emblematis in Cincilio Cardinalis Carpinii Asservatis (Rome, 1691):—An Pontifex Romanus Baculo Pastoralis Utatur (ibid. 1690):—De Sacris Edificiis a Constantino Magno Constructis (ibid. 1693):—De Perpetuo Azyorum usu in Ecclesia Lat. (ibid. 1688):—De Cruce Stationali (ibid. 1774):—Examen Libri Pontificalis (ibid. 1688). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 573, 613, 620, 632, 635, 680; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Cian, an early Welsh saint, was patron of Llangain, a chapel under Llanbadrig, in Carnarvonshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 302).

Cianan (or Kenanus), bishop of Duleek (Damliag), is commemorated Nov. 24. He appears to have been a great favorite with St. Patrick, who ordained him bishop, and presented him with a copy of the Gospels, a most valuable gift at that time. The Church of Duleek was also among the first that St. Patrick built in Meath, and had this special pre-eminence, that it was built of stone; it is called the first stone church in Ireland, and to this day perpetuates the name of the "Stone Building," Damliag, of which Duleek is a corruption. See Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, p. 141 sq.; Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 315; Ware, Irish Bishops, p. 137, Harris's ed.; Butler, Lives of the Saints, xi, 505; Forbes, Kalendar of Scottish Saints, p. 301.

Cianci, IGNACIO, an Italian poet and theologian, a native of the kingdom of Naples, lived in the second part of the 18th century. He was inspector-general of the order of barefooted Augustinian monks, and wrote Poemata (Venice, 1757), under the assumed name of Dasmone Andriaci. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ciantes, Giuseppe Maria, an Italian prelate and Dominican theologian, brother of the following, was born at Rome in 1602. He devoted himself to the study of Oriental languages, and had the opportunity of applying his knowledge of Hebrew for the conversion of the Jews, to whom Urban VIII had appointed him preacher in Rome. Having been called in 1640 as bishop of Marsico, in the kingdom of Naples, he distinguished himself by the good example which he set in his diocese. In 1656 he resigned the episcopal functions to retire to the convent of Minerva, where he died in 1670, leaving De Sanctissima Trinitate (Rome, 1667; in French by Du Motier, ibid. 1668):—De Sanctissima Christi Incarnatione (ibid. 1668; also in Ital. and French, ibid. ead.):—Della Perfezzione, etc. (1669):—Summa contra Gentes D. Thomas Aquinatis, etc., his own Hebrew version (1657). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 180.

Ciantes, Ignacio (or Ambrogio), an Italian prelate and theologian of the Dominican order, was born at Rome in 1594. After having taught theology in the convent of Minerva, he became provincial of Naples, then general commissary of Calabria and Sicily. Everywhere he reformed abuses, and quickened the taste for letters and sciences. He served as bishop of the two dioceses of Bisaccia and San Angelo, Lombardy, with great zeal, but in 1661 resigned, in order to retire to the convent of Minerva. He died at Rome, Dec. 24, 1667. Besides several discourses, he left Constitutiones et Decreta, etc. (Rome, 1652):—Ceremoniale Ordinis Prædicatorum (Naples, 1654):—Raccolta de' Miracoli dell' Immagine di San Domenico di Soriano (Milan, 1640; Rome, 1642; Naples, 1656). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Ciar (Cler, Cera, or Cyra). The Irish calendars give three dedications to saints of this name, Jan. 5, Feb. 8, Oct. 16; but the first and last probably belong to the same individual. At Jan. 5 is the feast of the birth of St. Ciar or Cera, virgin of Kill-Cheire, and at Oct. 16 is that of her death. When her sanctity became known, and her disciples were numerous, she went forth with several virgins, and received from St. Munna or Fintan (Oct. 21) the monastery of Tech-telle in Heli, or Eli O'Carrol, in King's County, which he had built and then left to St. Ciar. After a short residence here she returned to her native province, and founded the nunnery of Kil-cheive, which she governed till her death, in A. D. 680. See Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. of Ireland, iii, 129 sq.; Kelly, Cal. of Irish Saints, p. 51; Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 7; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i, 62 sq.

Ciaran (or Kieran). A large number of saints by this name appear in the Irish calendars, but of these only five have much more than the date and place of dedication:

1. Son of Ædh, commemorated Jan. 5.
2. The Pious, of Belach-duin, commemorated June 14. Little is known of him further than that he wrote the Acts of St. Patrick, and died A. D. 770. See Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. of Ireland, i, 87.
3. Abbot of Rathmurge, commemorated Oct. 8, died A. D. 784.
4. Of Saighir, commemorated March 5. The Lives of him are of doubtful authority. Lanigan is of opinion that he became a bishop about A. D. 538, and afterwards built the monastery of Saighir, around which a city gradually arose. He was the founder and first bishop of Ossory, and died there after A. D. 550.
5. Macantsaioir, or son of the carpenter, and abbot of Clonmacnoise, commemorated Sept. 9. He is one of the most famous saints of Ireland, and half the monasteries of that country are said to have followed his rule. The year of his birth is variously stated from A. D. 507 to 516. He received his baptism and early education from St. Patrick's disciple, St. Justus. He was famous for his miracles, like all the others of his age, and also for his humility and purity. He died of the plague which raged A. D. 549. He is one of the "Patres Priores" in St. Cumin or Cuminian's Paschal Letter. See Forbes, Cal. of Scott. Saints, p. 435, 436; Wilson, Prehist. Am. Scot. p. 483.

Cibar. See CYBAR.

Ciborium. The word is no doubt derived from the Greek κιβώριον, the primary meaning of which is the cup-like seed-vessel of the Egyptian water-lily.

It does not appear when the ciborium came first to be in use, though this was probably at as early a date as that in which architectural splendor was employed in the construction of churches. Augusti quotes Eusebius (Vit. Const. M. iii, 38) as using the word κιβώριον when describing the Church of the Sepulchre at Jerusalem, and connecting it with the word ἡμισφαίριον; but in this there seems to be a mistake, as neither word occurs in cap. 38, while in cap. 37 the latter occurs in connection with κεφάλαιον; by which last it would seem that the apse was meant.

Paulinus of Nola has been thought to allude to the ciborium in the verses (Epig. ii, 2):

"Divinum veneranda tegunt altaria sedua, Compositique sacra cum cruce martyribus."

Veils are mentioned by Chrysostom (Hom. iii in Ephes.) as withdrawn at the consecration of the eucharist, and it is probable that these were attached to the ciborium in the fashion represented by the accompanying woodcut, where a ciborium is shown with the veils concealing the altar.

Ciborium, from Mosaic in the Church of St. George at Thessalonica.

Ciboria are not mentioned in the Liber Pontificalis in the long catalogue of altars erected in, and gifts made to, churches erected in Rome and Naples by Constantine, unless the "fastigium," of silver, weighing 2025 lbs. in the basilica of St. John Lateran, was, as some have thought, a ciborium. Mention is made in the Liber

Ciborium of San Apollinare in Classe, at Ravenna.

Pontificalis of many other ciboria; they are generally described as of silver or decorated with silver. The ciborium in St. Sophia's, as erected by Justinian, is described by Paul the Siliary as having four columns of silver which supported an octagonal pyramidal dome or blunt spire, crowned by a globe bearing a cross. From the arches hung rich veils woven with figures of Christ, St. Paul, St. Peter, etc.

Ciboria were constructed not only of metal, or of wood covered with metal, but of marble; the alabaster columns of the ciborium of the high-altar of St. Mark's at Venice are said to have occupied the same position in the chapel of the Greek emperor at Constantinople. They are entirely covered with subjects from Biblical history, sculptured in relief, and appear to be of as early a date as the 5th century; but perhaps the earliest ciborium now existing is one in the Church of San Apollinare in Classe, at Ravenna, which is shown by the inscription engraved upon it to have been erected between A.D. 806 and A.D. 810.

Various ornaments, as vases, crowns, and baskets (cophini) of silver, were placed as decorations upon or suspended from the ciboria; and, as has already been said, veils or curtains were attached to them; these last were withdrawn after the consecration, but before the elevation of the eucharist.

It does not appear when the use of these veils was discontinued in the Western Church; in the Eastern a screen (εἰκονόστασις) with doors now serves the like purpose; some of the ciboria at Rome have a ring fixed in the centre of the vault, from which it is supposed a receptacle for the host was suspended. See PERISTERIUM. No ciborium now existing at Rome seems to be of earlier date than the Ciborium of the Fourteenth Century.

12th century, but the practice of suspending such receptacles is no doubt much earlier. See BALDOCHINO.

Ciborium is likewise a modern name for a vessel of precious metal, like a chalice or cup in shape, with a covering surmounted by a cross. It is used in the Roman Catholic Church to contain the sacrament, under the form of bread, when distributed.

Cibot, PIERRE MARTIAL, a French missionary, was born at Limoges in 1727. He studied in the College of Louis-le-Grand at Paris, and joined, when young, the society of the Jesuits. He distinguished himself by teaching philosophy. His zeal for the propagation of the faith led him to China in 1758. His description of his journey is interesting. The emperor of China made him his gardener and mathematician. Cibot wrote, in illustration of the book of Esther, a work still unprinted, consisting of three volumes, of which ample extracts have been given in the last ten volumes of Mémoires de la Chine. He died at Peking, Aug. 8, 1780. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ciboule, ROBERT, a French theologian and moralist, was born at Breteuil in Normandy. He was chancellor of Notre Dame at Paris, and chamberlain to pope Nicholas V, and dean of Evreux; was sent by the king to the Council of Constance, and in 1437 was among the jurists who advised the rehabilitation of the Maid of Orleans. He died in 1458, leaving several works in MS., also La Sainte Méditation de l'Homme sur soi-même (printed at Paris in 1510):—La Consultation de Cibule en Faveur de la Pucelle (printed by extracts in the edition of the Procès, iii, 326-328). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ciccione, ANDREA, a reputable Italian architect, who flourished in the former part of the 15th century, studied in the school of Masuccio the younger, where he obtained considerable distinction. Among other good works, he erected the famous monastery and church of Monte Oliveto. He also designed the third cloister of San Severino, in the Ionic order, and the small Church of the Pontano, near the Pietra Santa. He died about 1440. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cicé, LOUIS DE, a French Dominican missionary, lived in the beginning of the 18th century. He was apostolic vicar in China, and wrote Acta Cantonensis (1700):—Lettre aux Jésuites sur les Idolâtries de la Chine (ed. 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ciceri, BERNARDINO, a painter of Pavia, was born in 1650, and was one of the ablest scholars of Carlo Sacchi. He visited Rome to complete his studies, and on his return to Paris was much employed by the churches.

Ciceri, PAUL CÉSAR DE, a French court-preacher, was born at Cavaillon, May 24, 1678, and died April 27, 1759, leaving Sermons et Panégyriques (Avignon, 1761, 6 vols. 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cichovius, NICOLAUS, a Polish Jesuit, was born in 1598. For some time he lectured on philosophy and theology at Posen, but made himself especially known by his writings against the Arians, in consequence of which no Arian was tolerated in Poland. He died at Cracow, March 27, 1669, leaving Credo Arianorum:—Colloquium Kiortense:—Speculum Infidelitatis Arianæ:—Speculum Arianorum:—Triginta Rationes pro Avertendis Omnibus ab Contagio Arianorum. See Aleambe, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Cicogna, EMANUELE ANTONIO, an Italian historian and archaeologist, was born at Venice, Jan. 17, 1789, studied at Udino, became imperial procurator in 1811, and died in his native city, Feb. 22, 1868. His main work is Inscrizioni Veneziane (Venice, 1824-53, 6 vols.);

he also wrote, Di Stefano Piazzone da Asola (ibid. 1840):—Della Famiglia Marcello (ibid. 1841):—Intorno alla Veneta Patrizia Famiglia Foscolo (ibid. 1842):—Saggio di Bibliografia Veneziana (ibid. 1847):—Vita e Scritti di G. Rossi (ibid. 1852):—Origine della Confraternita di San Giovanni Evangelista (ibid. 1855):—Giovanni Muslerio da Ottinga (ibid. 1855); etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Cidaris is a term used to distinguish a low-crowned episcopal mitre.

Cienfuegos, ALVAREZ, a Spanish prelate and statesman, was born at Agüera, in the Asturias, Feb. 27, 1657, and belonged to the Jesuit order. He was first a professor at Compostella, and afterwards at Salamanca. For some time he occupied the archiepiscopal see of Monreale; was, in 1720, cardinal priest; in 1724, president of the highest Spanish council at Vienna; in 1733, imperial minister at Rome, and, in 1735, protector of the nuns of Santa Susanna there. In 1737 he resigned his archbishopric, and died at Rome, Aug. 12, 1739. He wrote, De Perfectionibus Christi Servatoris:—De Sapientia Dei:—De Scientia Media:—De Simonia:—Enigma Theologicum seu Potius Enigmatum et Obscurissimarum Questionum Compendium (2 vols. fol.). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Ciezo (or Ciezar), MIGUEL GERONIMO, a reputable historical painter of Granada, studied under Alonso Cano, and died in the year 1677. There are several of his best works in the convent del Angel, and in the hospital Corpus Domini, at Granada.

Cignani, Carlo, an Italian painter, was born at Bologna in 1628, and studied under Battista Cairo and Albano. He was also influenced by the genius of Correggio. His greatest work is The Assumption, round the cupola of the Church of the Madonna del Fuoco, at Forlì, which occupied him twenty years, and is one of the grandest and most remarkable works of art of the 17th century. He died at Forlì, Sept. 6, 1719. The following are some of his best works: Adam and Eve; a Temptation of Joseph, in the Florentine Palazzo Arnoldi; and Samson, in the Bolognese Palazzo Zambeccari. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cignani, Felice, an Italian painter, son and scholar of Carlo, was born at Bologna in the year 1660, and died in 1724. In the Church della Trinità at Bologna is a picture by him of The Virgin and Infant, with Saints; and an admirable picture of St. Francis Receiving the Stigmata, in the Cappuccini.

Cignani, Paolo, an Italian painter, nephew and scholar of Carlo, was born at Bologna in 1709, and died in 1764. There is a fine picture by him, at Savignano, of St. Francis Appearing to St. Joseph of Copertino.

Cignaroli, GIOVANNI BETTINO, an Italian painter, was born at Verona in 1706; studied under Santo Prunato at Venice, and afterwards under Antonio Balestra; and died in 1770 or 1772. At Pontremoli is an admirable picture by him of St. Francis Receiving the Stigmata; and there is a Flight into Egypt, in San Antonio, at Parma. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cigoli. See CARDI.

Cihuacohuate was the snake-woman, the mother of the human race, highly venerated among the Mexicans.

Cilian. See KILIAN.

Cilicia, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Ciliciense), provincial, was held in 423, against the Pelagian heresy. Theodore of Mopsuestia, a town in this province, was condemned as one of the heads of this heresy. See Meccator Marius, p. 219; Mansi, Concil. iv, 473.

Cillinia, Saint, is the name of two early Christian women:

1. The mother of St. Remigius, archbishop of Rheims, and apostle of France. She was probably born about A.D. 400, and lived and died in Laurinacium, where Remigius buried her. She is commemorated Oct. 21. See Migne, Patrol. Lat. cxxxv, 43.

2. A virgin, celebrated at Meaux. The exact date of her birth is uncertain, but she is known to have lived in the time of St. Geneviève, the patron saint of Paris, who died about 509-512. She is commemorated on October 21. See Gall. Christ. viii, 1675.

Cilla (or Cille, also Cissa), an English abbess, was niece of Cissa, regulus of Wessex in the reign of Kentwin (A.D. 676-685), and sister of Heane, the founder of the monastery at Abingdon. Out of her patrimonial estate she erected (about 690) a nunnery, which she named after the Holy Cross and St. Helena, at Helenstow, near the Thames, in Berkshire. Cilla presided over her foundation until her death, after which the community removed higher up the Thames, to Witham.

Cillen (Cillian, Cillin, Killinus, or Killianus) occurs frequently as a name of saints in the Irish calendars: whether the initials be C., K., or Q., the name is the same, and derived from Cill ("a cell"):

1. Son of Lubnen, is commemorated April 14. Colgan (Acta Sanctorum, 473, c. 4) enumerates him among the prelates of Saighir, where he was abbot, and gives his date as A.D. 695. See Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. iii, 140 sq.

2. Commemorated July 8, became abbot of Iona in A.D. 726. For some now unknown reason he was called Droicteach, or the Bridge-maker. He died A.D. 732. See Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. iii, 166, 192; Forbes, Kel. of Scott. Saints, p. 301.

3. Commemorated April 19, was the thirteenth abbot of Iona, and succeeded Faelan, A.D. 724. He was called Foda or Fada, the Tall, to distinguish him from his successor, Cillen Droicteach. He died in 726.

4. Bishop of Techtalani, is commemorated on May 27. When St. Patrick came to the region of Uí-Meithire, in Ulster, he is said to have built a church at Teaghtalani and placed it in charge of bishop Cillen.

5. Cillen Ua Colla, abbot of Fathain Mura, now Fahan, is commemorated Jan. 3. He succeeded St. Kellach, and died about 724. See Todd and Reeves, Mart. Doneg. p. 7; O'Hanlan, Irish Saints, i, 57.

Cilley, Daniel P., a convert from heathenism under the labors of Rev. Mr. Phillips, a Free-will Baptist missionary in India, belonged to the native tribe known as the Santals. He became connected with the boarding-school at Jellassore, and was baptized, with three others, Aug. 29, 1847. He is said to have possessed more than ordinary talents, and for some time was employed in the mission as a school-teacher. A little more than a year previous to his death, having given evidence of his call to the ministry, he was received on probation as a preacher of the Gospel to his fellow-countrymen. He died at Dantoon, India, Jan. 3, 1856. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1857, p. 9. (J.C.S.)

Cilley, Joseph L., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Maine in 1804. His ministry was devoted to churches and destitute regions along the seaboard of his native state, and was attended with a good measure of success. He died at Camden, Me., June 30, 1871. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1873, p. 83. (J.C.S.)

Cima, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (called il Conegliano), an Italian painter, was born in 1460 at Conegliano, near Treviso, in the state of Venice, and practiced the art from 1489 to 1541. One of his best works is now in the Louvre, at Paris, The Virgin and Infant, Receiving the Homage of Several Saints. His Descent from the Cross, in San Niccolo, at Carpi, is considered very good. In San Giovanni, at Venice, is a fine picture by him of The Baptism of Christ. Some of the altar-pieces attributed to him may belong to his son Carlo.

Cimabue, GIOVANNI GUALTIERI, an Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1240. He seems to have rescued the art from its gross and barbarous state, so that he has been called the father of modern painters. He learned his peculiar skill from some Greek artists who were employed in the Church of Santa Maria Novella. His productions, at that time, were regarded with the greatest astonishment, and when he had finished his picture of the Virgin, the Florentines carried it in procession to the above-named church. Few of his works have remained to the present day. However, in Santa Croce, at Florence, is still preserved his St. Francis, and in San Stefano his St. Cecilia. Cimabue died in 1310. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cimarelli, VINCENTE MARIA, an Italian historian and Dominican priest, was born at Corinaldo, in the duchy of Urbino, in the beginning of the 17th century. He taught theology, was inquisitor in different states, and died at Brescia in 1660, leaving Resolutiones Physicæ et Morales (Brescia, 1640):—Istoria Della Stato d' Urbino da' Senoni (ibid. 1642). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cimoyok, in Lithuanian mythology, was a field and forest god among the ancient inhabitants of the coast of the Baltic sea. He was considered one of the wise, good deities, and statues were erected for him, mostly under elder bushes, which were thought to be the dwelling-places of good spirits.

Cinauc. See CYNOC.

Cinninato, ROMOLO, an Italian painter, was born at Florence about 1525, and studied under Francesco Salviati. In 1567 he was invited by Philip II to Spain, where he passed the greater part of his life. His principal works are in the Escorial, where he painted the great cloister in fresco, and in the church two pictures, of St. Jerome, reading, and the same saint preaching to his disciples. He died at Madrid in 1600 (or 1598). See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cincture is (1) a band or girdle; (2) the flat band, usually about three yards long and four inches broad, used to confine the clerical cassock round the waist. It is made of silk, serge, or stuff, and is commonly fringed at the ends with silk fringe. See CINGULUM.

Cingtilum (a girdle). The alb is gathered in at the waist by the belt, ornamented at its ends with a fringe or tassels. This was commonly made of white thread, twisted in some cases, but in others flat, like a band. Among the inventories of the larger mediæval churches, however, many are mentioned of silk, adorned with gold, and jewelled. If like a cord, it was made fast round the loins by a knot; if otherwise, with a buckle, and the fringed or tasselled ends hung down on the cleric's left side. See CINCTURE.

Cinna (Cinne, or Cinnia), Saint, a virgin, is commemorated on February 1. As she persistently refused to marry Corburac, her father, Eochaidh, at last permitted her to be with St. Patrick, who gave her the veil of chastity about A.D. 480, and committed her to the care of Cethuberis, in the monastery of Druimduchan, where she remained till death.

Cinthila, a king of the Goths, brother and successor of king Sisenand, assisted at the fifth council of Toledo, the decrees of which he confirmed. The canons made at this council were intended for the benefit of Cinthila and his race. On Jan. 9, 638, he convoked the sixth council of Toledo, at which nineteen canons were made. They commence with a profession of faith, in which forty-seven bishops and five absent deputies, Silva, bishop of Narbonne, being at the head, acknowledge the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Cio Concioa, in Lamaian mythology, is the second person in the trinity which the Lamaïtes recognise. Cio, as an animal and man, went through a thousand gradations of transmigration until he reached the highest stage of perfection. This happened in the fifth age of the world's existence. Lhamoghiupul had married, after the requisite consecration by a Lahen (blessed spirit), king Sazan. Cio Concioa chose to be born in the body of this nymph. The birth took place through her right side without an opening being noticeable. The newly born child immediately made seven leaps towards the four corners of the heavens. Four of these seven were made towards the west, which signified that he would bless that quarter. The earth quaked for joy six times, and bowed itself before him; a pure, shining light (called Xaka) encircled the babe, lighted up the æther, and cast its light through the infant's body, so that it shone with the brightness of the sun. The Lahen descended from the heavens, worshipped, and presented it with delightfully scented gifts; a lukewarm rain came from the clouds and washed the boy, whereupon he was consecrated to the god Lhura. This happened in the city of Shershiagi, on the banks of the Ganges, where a holy ascetic prophesied to the child that he would lead a pure, blessed life. Cio had been instructed by the angels in all things. No one on earth could teach him anything more. He himself instructed many scholars in divine wisdom. He took two wives, Sazoma and Traziema, and settled in a wilderness, where many pupils collected about him, whom he taught the true religion. He even reformed by his holiness and wisdom thousands of demons, so that they turned from the evil to the good; and also showed the way to heaven, and converted an infinite number of nations to his doctrines. The whole Lama religion owes to him its existence. After living eight hundred years, the Lahen took Cio into heaven; also both his wives and more than five hundred female slaves had part in his blessedness; the rest went to a lower heaven. When he left the earth it quaked out of fright, and a fearful darkness of the sun, lasting three days, covered the whole world.

Circassians, RELIGION OF THE. This interesting people inhabit the mountain valleys in the northern declivities of the Caucasus. Their faith is a mixture of Mohammedanism, Paganism, and Christianity. The first of these is the prevailing belief, and is found mingled with remnants of the others. An attempt was early made to introduce Christianity, but without success, further than the erection of a few wooden crosses here and there. When passing these the natives stop and make an obeisance. They also observe a feast in the month of October, in which they present certain cakes and utter their invocations. This feast, they allege, was anciently instituted in honor of the mother of Jesus. They still observe pagan festivals, and offer sacrifices to Seeseres for a plentiful harvest, to Tschiblé (the god of thunder, war, and justice) for victories gained, to Thleps (the god of fire), to Isosserich (the god of wind and water), to Mesitcha, Sekutch, Pekoasch, Achin, and others. See Longworth, A Year among the Circassians; Bell, Journal of a Residence in Circassia.

Circe, in Greek mythology, a mighty sorceress, was the daughter of the god of the sun and of Perse, sister of Æetes, the king of Colchia. Her father carried her from Colchia towards the west, and placed her on an island in the neighborhood of Italy, which the sorceress soon changed to an enchanting spot. In a beautiful valley she lived, in a palace sparkling with gold and jewels; lions and wolves, which she had tamed, guarded her residence, and golden-haired nymphs, goddesses, such as she was, were her servants. When Ulysses, in his wanderings, came thither, he sent a part of his crew on shore to explore the island. Eurylochus, the leader, prudently remained at a distance, and thus escaped sharing the lot which fell to the rest. They were changed into swine, and fed on acorns. Ulysses now went himself to the dangerous sorceress. Mercury had given him a preventive against her witchery. Circe was taken by surprise when she discovered that her charm did not affect him, and she thereupon swore not to injure him nor his friends, to liberate the latter, and to share her kingdom and her love with him. One year Ulysses lived there, and Circe bore to him a son, Agrius. Latinus, Telegonus, and Cassiphone are also mentioned as her children. Now Ulysses longed for home, but Circe first sent him to Hades to ask the advice of the shade Tiresias. During Ulysses' stay with her, Calchus, the king of the Danians, whom she had formerly favored, came to her, but was changed into a swine, and only at the entreaties of the Danians was he restored, on condition of never returning again to the island. Telemachus came, seeking his father, and married her daughter Cassiphone;

but becoming angry with Circe, he killed her, and was therefore killed by his wife.

Diodorus relates the story as follows: Helios had two sons, Æetes and Perseus, who became kings of Colchis and Taurica respectively. Hecate, the daughter of Perseus, married Æetes, and gave birth to Circe and Medea, and one son, Ægialeus. Circe was occupied in the discovery of various poisons. The king of the Scythians took her in marriage, but her very first act was to poison her husband, and to take forcible possession of the kingdom. She was driven from the throne, and fled, with her women, to an uninhabited island.

Circignani, ANTONIO, an Italian painter, son and scholar of Niccolo, was born at Pomerance in the year 1560, and assisted his father in his works at Rome. He painted several pictures of The Life of St. Albert, for the Carmelite church of Santa Maria: also several subjects in the life of the Virgin, in La Madonna della Consolazione. He died in the year 1620.

Circuifti were the same as AGNOSTICI (q. v.).

Circutōrēs, synonymous with CIRCUMCELLIONES. See DONATISTS.

Circumcision, FESTIVAL OF THE, is the octave of Christmas. We present some further particulars on this subject:

"Its present name does not date earlier than the 6th or 7th century, and commemorates the shedding of our Lord's infant blood in conformity with the Mosaic law. The festival was established in the time of Leo the Great, but its occurrence on Jan. 1 is not mentioned before the Council of Tours, held in 567. It is marked in the ancient calendars, and in the martyrology of Jerome, Bede, and Usuard. The 'Sacramentary' of St. Gregory defines it 'in the Lord's octave.' The day was fixed in order to efface the relics of pagan superstition; and so in ancient missals two masses are appointed, one being called the mass to divert from idols. A fast was also observed at Milan and elsewhere, until the 9th century. In 578 the Council of Auxerre prohibited Christians from disguising themselves as stags or calves on the calends of January, and a penitential of Angers enjoined three years' penance for a similar offence. The second Council of Tours, in 567, required all priests and monks to have public prayer in church on this day; and the Council of Trullo forbade the observance of the calends."

CIRCUMCISION, THE GREAT, is a name sometimes applied by early Christian writers to the ordinance of baptism, because it takes the place of circumcision, and is the seal of the Christian covenant, as that was the seal of the covenant made with Abraham.

Cirey, JEAN DE, a French Cistercian of Dijon, flourished in the 15th century. In 1476 he became abbot of the monastery Balern, in Burgundy; attended in 1477 the synod held at Orleans, and in 1478 that held at Tours. He died Dec. 27, 1503, leaving Capitulum Generale Cisterciensis (Dijon, 1490):—Privilegia Ordinis Cistercii (ibid. 1491, 1630); and some other works. Cirta, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Cirtense). This was a town in Numidia where two provincial synods were held:

I. In 305 (or 308), to fill up the vacant bishopric of Cirta. Secundus, the primate of Numidia, presided, and drew from eleven or twelve of the bishops present a confession that they had been guilty of betraying the sacred books during the persecution. The better to understand their crime, it must be borne in mind that, during the Diocletian persecution, an edict was promulgated, ordering the destruction of the churches, and obliging the magistrates everywhere to take from the bishops and priests of the Church their copies of the Holy Scriptures. This edict was executed with the greatest rigor in Numidia; the magistrates themselves entered into the churches, and into the houses of the bishops and clergy, to search for the Scriptures, that they might burn them, threatening with the penalty of death all who refused to discover them. Many of the Christians were content to suffer any torment, and death itself, rather than betray them; but there were some, not merely among the lower orders of ecclesiastics, but also among the priests, and even bishops, who, through fear of death, were guilty of delivering up the sacred volumes: such were styled "Traditores." At Cirta there were, unhappily, many bishops and others of the clergy who had shown a miserable example of cowardice. After the bishops had confessed their sin in the council, Secundus gave them absolution.

Silvanus, a subdeacon, who had also been a traditor, was elected to the bishopric. See Labbe, Concil. i., 936.

II. In 412, in the month of June, under Silvanus, primate of Numidia, assisted by several bishops of the province and Augustine, upon the subject of the Donatists, who, finding themselves entirely worsted in the conference of Carthage, spread abroad a report, to cover the shame of their defeat, that Marcellinus, the judge of the conference, had been bribed by the Catholics, and that the Donatists had not been permitted a fair hearing. The fathers wrote a letter, dictated by Augustine, in which these calumnies are refuted. See Labbe, Concil. ii., 1518.

Cisara (Cissa, also Ciris), in the mythology of the Wends and Slavs, was a goddess of the fruitful earth, who is believed to be identical with Ceres, and was worshipped by the Rhetians, Vindelicians, Sorbians, also in Saxony, where the city Zeitz was named after her. In the vicinity of Augsburg she had a sacred wood, where her festivals were celebrated and sacrifices offered. The name of this mother of all the wise comes from the Slavonic Ziza (the breast).

Ciaholm, James, a Scotch prelate, was chaplain to king James III, and was advanced to the see of Dunblane in 1486, but was not consecrated until 1487. He occupied this see about forty years, and resigned in 1527. He was living in 1533. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 178.

Ciaholm, William, a Scotch prelate, was, during the lifetime of his uncle William, constituted coadjutor and future successor in the see of Dunblane, in 1564. He was much employed by the queen in civil and public affairs. He was also one of the commissioners for the divorcing of the earl of Bothwell from lady Jane Gordon. He went to France, where it is said he was made bishop of Vaison. He died a Carthusian at Grenoble. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 180.

Cissa (Cyssa, or Cyasse) is the name of two persons in the early history of Christian Britain:

1. A regulus in the reign of Kentwin, king of the West Saxons (A.D. 676-685), having authority over what is now Wiltshire and the greater part of Berkshire. He was a benefactor of Abingdon monastery, founded by his nephew Heane, and there he was buried.

2. An anchorite at Croyland, in the earlier part of the 8th century.

Cistæ were small chests or boxes which, among the ancient Greeks, were carried in procession in the festivals of Demeter and Dionysus. In these chests were certain utensils used in the worship of those deities.

Cistercians. In the following article we add some particulars respecting this order, especially in Great Britain:

"They came to England and settled at Waverley in 1128. From their eminent refounder, Bernard of Clairvaux, in 1118, they were often called Bernardines. They were distinguished by their silence, austerity, labor in the field, their gray or white habit, and dislike of ornament in their buildings. They erected their abbeys in lonely places, usually well-wooded and watered valleys, far away from human habitation, and were principally noted for their success as graziers, shepherds, and farmers. The short choir, the transeptal aisle, divided into certain chapels, the low central tower, the grisaille glass in the windows, the solitary bell, the absence of tessellated pavements, pictures, mural color, and many lights in their churches; the regular and almost invariable arrangement of the conventual buildings, with the dormitory at the eastern side of the cloister, communicating with the transept by a flight of stairs; the refectory set at right angles to the cloister; the chapter-house divided into aisles, except at Margam in Wales, are unerring notes of the houses of the order. There were, in later days, modifications of this extreme rigor in the towers of Fontaines and Furness, and noble choirs of the former church, Rievaulx, and Sallay: in the exceptional apse of Beaulieu, and the chevet of Croxden, with its crown of radiating chapels and the use of stained glass and armorial tiles. But in general the character of extreme simplicity, verging on baldness, was preserved. Only one abbey church, that of Scarborough, remains in use: the rest are in ruins or destroyed. At Bulldwae, Jorevalle, Melrose, Byland, Rievaulx, Ford, Merevale, Boyle, Tintern, Lilleshall, Kirkstall, and Netley, it is still possible to trace the ground-plan, or reconstruct the arrangement of the ancient buildings. The absence of an eastern lady chapel in England is always observable. No such adjunct was ever built, because the entire church was dedicated to St. Mary. The square east end may be said to have been universal in England, for there were but two instances to the contrary: but, with the exception of Cîteaux, which was square-ended, the finest ministers on the Continent presented an apse or chevet. The triforium story was rare in England."

Citation is a summons formally served upon a person charged with an offence, at the instance of an ecclesiastical judge or court, requiring him to appear on a certain day, at a certain place, to answer the complaint made against him.

Cithinus was one of the "martyres Scillitani" at Carthage, commemorated July 17 in the calendars of Carthage, Bede, old Roman, and that of Usuard.

Citalicue, in Mexican mythology, was a goddess to whom was attributed the protection of the world.

Citallatonak, in Mexican mythology, was an ancient mighty god of the tribes of the Andes, the husband of Citalicue. A magnificent city was their residence, from which they had a watchful eye over the people and the world. They had many children.

Citrage, in the religion of India, was a hieroglyphic sign marked on the breast or forehead to show the sect to which one belonged.

Citta (Di Castello), FRANCESCO DA, an Italian artist of the 16th century, studied under Pietro Perugino. He painted in the chapel of Bernardino, in Ara Coeli, at Rome. In the Church of the Conventuali, at Citta di Castello, is a fine altar-piece by him, representing The Annunciation. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cittadini, PIETRO FRANCESCO (called il Milanese), an Italian painter, was born at Milan about 1616, studied under Guido, and died at Bologna in 1681. The following are some of his principal works in Bologna: The Stoning of Stephen; Christ Praying in the Garden; The Flagellation, in the Church of San Stefano. There is a fine picture by him in the Church of Santa Agata, of that saint. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Cittinus, a Numidian bishop, is addressed by Cyprian (Epist. 170).

Citu, in the religion of the Andes tribes, was a festival of purification, especially among the Peruvians. A fast, lasting twenty-four hours, and a bath preceded this festival. At its celebration four servants of the sun were consecrated by the Inca.

Civaux, FRANÇOIS, a French martyr, was secretary to the French ambassador in England in Queen Mary's time, and being desirous to hear the word of God, went to Geneva. He was also secretary to the senate or council of Geneva, where he continued one year. He then went to Dijon. The priest at this place preached certain doctrines which Civaux could not believe, and he reasoned with him in a friendly way, showing him by the Scriptures where he erred. This offended the priest, and he had him taken to prison. In seven days after, Civaux was brought to the place of execution, where first he was strangled, and then burned, at Paris, in 1559. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 444.

Civerchio, VINCENTE (called il Vecchio di Crema), an Italian painter, was born at Crema, in Lombardy, and flourished from 1500 to 1535. In the cathedral of Crema is a picture by this master, representing Justice and Temperance. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ciwa, an early Welsh saint, was a patron of Llangwg, otherwise Llanguke, in Glamorganshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 307).

Cizemsky, ANDREW REMI, a Polish theologian of the Franciscan order, lived in the latter part of the 17th century, and wrote Laurus Triumphalis Poloniae a Suecis, etc. (Cracow, 1660). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Claes, GUILLAUME MARCEL, a Flemish theologian, was born at Gheel, in Brabant, Oct. 8, 1658. He was professor of morals at the University of Louvain, and died in 1710, leaving a valuable work, Ethica seu Moralis (Louvain, 1702, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Claesson, ANDERS MAGNUS, a Swedish Baptist minister, was born in 1831. He was converted in early youth, and while studying at Linköping, in 1857, in order to fit himself to become a school-teacher, opened a Sunday-school, which was such an innovation upon the old order of things that it awakened no small amount of opposition in the community. Having received an appointment from the American Baptist Publication Society, as one of its colporteurs in Sweden, he served them in that capacity from 1859 to 1866, and amid much persecution may be said to have laid the foundation for the Smoland Association of Baptist Churches. He died Jan. 23, 1881. See National Baptist, March 24, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Claessen, DIETRICH SIEGFRIED, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, Nov. 4, 1685. He studied at his native place and at Leyden, was in 1713 rector of the Friedrichs-Werder Gymnasium at Berlin, in 1715 preacher of the Reformed Church, as well as court and cathedral preacher there. In 1720 he was called as professor of theology to his native place, where he was also made doctor of theology. He died at Herborn in 1743, leaving Animadversiones Philologico-Theologicae: — De Encensu Judeorum: — De Existentiis Dei. See Neubauer, Nachrichten von jetztlebenden Gottesgelehrten; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Claessoon, ARNOLD (called by Dutch writers Aart Klaaszoon, or Aartgen van Leyden), a Dutch historical painter, was born at Leyden in 1498, studied under Engelbrechten, and died in 1564. There are two pictures by him, much praised, at Leyden, representing The Crucifixion, and Christ Bearing his Cross. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.

Clagett, NICHOLAS (1), an English divine, was born at Canterbury in 1607, and in 1628 entered Merton College, Oxford, where, in 1631, he took his degree of A.B. In 1636 he became vicar of Melbourne, in Dorsetshire, and some years later was elected minister at St. Mary's Church, in Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk. He died Sept. 12, 1663, having published The Abuses of God's Grace (1659, 4to).

Clagett, NICHOLAS (2), D.D., an English divine, was born in May, 1654, and was educated at the free school of Bury St. Edmunds, under Mr. Edward Luds. He took his degree in the arts from Christ College, Cambridge, Jan. 12, 1671. In March, 1680, he was made pastor at St. Mary's, in Bury St. Edmunds; Feb. 1, 1683, he was instituted to the rectory of Thurlow parva; June 14, 1689, he was collated to the archdeaconry of Sudbury, and in March, 1707, he was instituted to the rectory of Hitcham, in Suffolk. He died Jan. 30, 1726 or 1727, leaving some single Sermons, a pamphlet entitled A Persuasive to an Ingenious Trial of Opinions in Religion (Lond. 1685, 4to), and The Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies (ibid. 1710, 8vo).

Clagett, NICHOLAS (3), D.D., an English prelate, son of the preceding, became archdeacon of Buckingham in 1722, dean of Rochester in 1724, was consecrated bishop of St. David's, Jan. 23, 1732, and translated to the see of Exeter in 1742. He became at the same time prebendary and archdeacon of Exeter, and died Dec. 8, 1746, leaving several single Sermons. See Le Neve, Fasti; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Claggett, ERASTUS BALDWIN, a Congregational minister, was born in Newport, N. H., May 9, 1815. He received his preparatory education at Kimball Union Academy, was a student in Dartmouth College, and graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1844. He was ordained at Lyndeborough, N. H., Sept. 30, 1846, where he remained until Sept. 20, 1870, then became acting pastor at New Fairfield, Conn., in October of that year, and remained as such until his death, May 16, 1877. He published, in the Congregational Quarterly for 1864, a History of the Union Association. (W. P. S.)

Claire, Saint. See CLARE.

Clairé, MARTIN, a French poet, born at Saint-Vallery-sur-Mer in 1612, joined the Jesuits, and died at La Flèche, May 25, 1690, leaving Hymni Ecclesiastici Novo Cultu Adornati (Paris, 1673, with additions). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clajus (or Clay), CHRISTIAN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, who died in 1723 while pastor at Falkenstein, is the author of Disp. de Recto usu Rationis (Leipzig, 1696): — De Rege Agrippa Act. xxi, xxii (ibid. eod.): — De Die Parasceves (ibid. 1697). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 618; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Clajus (or Clay), JOHANN (the elder), a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Herberg, in Saxony, in 1533. He studied at Grimma and Leipzig, was at first rector at Goldberg, then at Nordhausen, and finally pastor at Bendeleben, where he died April 11,

1592. He published Elementa Lingue Ebraicæ (Wittenberg, 1573, a. o.):—Libri Tres Prosodici Latinorum, Græcorum, et Hebræorum (ibid. 1614):—Ecclesiastes Salomonis Carmine Redditus et Enarratus (ibid. 1583). He also translated into Hebrew the gospels and epistles for the Christian year, the Augsburg Confession, and forty-one hymns. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, a. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 180; Steinschneider, Bibliographisches Handbuch, p. 35; Perschmann, Johannes Cluius des Aeltern Leben und Schriften (Nordhausen, 1874); Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Clamacteria, in ecclesiastical technology, are little bells attached to "crowns of light" or chandeliers. See CORONA LUCIS.

Clamenges (Claminges, or Clémangis), MATTHIEU NICOLAS DE, a French theologian, was born about 1360, in the village of Clamenges (Clemangia), near Châlons, in Champagne. He went to Paris at the age of twelve, and was admitted to the College of Navarre, of which his uncle, Pierre de Clamenges, a celebrated physician, was master. There he distinguished himself by his poetry. In 1393 he became rector of the Academy at Paris. In 1394 he presented a treatise on the royal authority, which caused a conflict between the University of Paris and the government of Charles VI, in consequence of which the schools were closed for some time. It is said that this conflict even caused the death of pope Clement VII. His successor, Benedict XIII, made Clamenges his secretary. But in 1408 a bull of excommunication was sent forth by the pope against Charles VI, in consequence of which Clamenges was obliged to spend several years in Tuscany, in the Abbey of Vallombrosa. After this, however, he went back to France, and was successively treasurer of Langres, cantor and archdeacon of Bayeux. He spent his last years at the College of Navarre, and died there about 1440, leaving a number of works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.

Clanahan, SAMUEL, a Scotch clergyman, was born July 17, 1779; educated at the parish school; studied at the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh; was licensed to preach in 1805; became tutor in the family of Robert Hathorn Stewart in 1806; was presented to the living at Glasserton in 1813, and ordained, and died Feb. 27, 1849. He was a man of few words, sententious, witty, fond of playfulness, modest, and diffident. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 732.

Clancularii were a Christian sect which arose after the Reformation in the 16th century. They attached very little importance to the sacraments, alleging that if religion was seated in the heart there was no need of any outward expression of it.

Clancy, JOHN, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Johnstown, N. Y., March 26, 1793. He was prepared for college by Rev. Dr. Yale of Kingsborough, and graduated from Middlebury College in 1818; taught one year in the academy at Castleton; graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1822, and the following year was city missionary in Boston. He was licensed to preach by the Londonderry Presbytery in 1822, went to Virginia as missionary, and continued one year. In 1825 he became pastor at Charlton, N. Y., and remained sixteen years. After this he supplied the Congregational Church at Belchertown, Mass., until 1846, when he returned to his old charge in Charlton, and remained there six years, supplying also the Presbyterian Church at Princetown one year, and the Church of Hamilton Union of Guilderland five years. In 1855 he became pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church in Minaville, Montgomery Co., N. Y., remaining until 1860, when he removed to Schenectady, supplying various churches in the vicinity, and preaching six months at Little Falls. He served faithfully and efficiently as clerk of the presbytery for twenty years. Enfeebled by age, he was obliged to retire from active duty, and many persons have said they never saw a happier old man. He died in Schenectady, Sept. 9, 1876. (W. P. S.)

Clannie, HUGH, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1675; was called to the living at Kirkbean in 1687, and ordained; was a member of the assemblies of 1690 and 1692, and deposed in 1696 for drunkenness. He was banished in 1713 for marrying persons irregularly. He afterwards joined the "Levellers," a party which arose in Galway, in 1724, to take the government into their own hands, and he, being the only learned person among them, was employed to draw up their papers. He published, in 1698, in Latin, an account of his party. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 584.

Clap, Nathaniel, a Congregational minister, was born at Dorchester, Mass., in January, 1668, and graduated from Harvard College in 1690. He began his work as a minister in Newport, R. I., in 1695. After many trials of faith and patience a Church was formed, of which he was ordained the pastor, Nov. 3, 1720. He preached there about half a century, and died Oct. 30, 1745. He was a saintly and patriarchal man, but never married. The celebrated dean Berkeley said of him, "Before I saw father Clap, I thought the bishop of Rome had the gravest aspect of any man I ever saw, but really the minister of Newport has a more venerable appearance." He published only a Sermon (1715). See Callender, Funeral Sermons; Whitefield, Journal (J. C. S.)

Clap, Thomas, an eminent Congregational divine, was born at Scituate, Mass., June 26, 1703. While attending Harvard University, where he graduated in 1722, he made a profession of religion. He was ordained pastor over the Congregational Church in Windham, Conn., in 1726, and continued there until 1739, when he assumed the presidency of Yale College, being installed into his new office April 2, 1740. He resigned in 1766, and died at the home of his youth, Jan. 7, 1767. "President Clap was a man of marked qualities, strong mental powers, clear perception, solid judgment; though sometimes turned aside by prejudice, as in the case of Whitefield. He was a good scholar, an instructive preacher, Calvinistic in doctrine, not fond of parade, peaceful in death." He published a History of Yale College, a number of Sermons, Essays, etc., and had gathered materials for a history of Connecticut. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 262.

Claparède, DAVID, an eminent Reformed theologian of Switzerland, was born in 1727 at Geneva, where he was ordained in 1751. Having returned from his travels in Holland and England, he was appointed pastor at his native place in 1761, and two years later was also elected professor of theology. He occupied the pulpit from 1761 to 1790, and the professor's chair from 1763 to 1798. He published only one great work, Considérations sur les Miracles de l'Évangile (Geneva, 1765; translated into English and German), besides twenty-six Dissertations, published from time to time. He died in 1801. Claparède was an eloquent preacher, a staunch reformer, and an able divine. A selection of his sermons was published in 1805. See Senebier, Histoire Littéraire de Genève, iii; Haag, La France Protestante, iii; Sayous, Le Dix-huitième Siècle à l'Étranger, i; Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 393. (B. P.)

Clapham, SAMUEL, an English clergyman who died in 1830, aged seventy-six, published, under the name of "Theophilus St. John," Original Sermons (1790):—Practical Sermons (1803, 2 vols.):—Charges of Massillon, from the French (1805):—Points of Sessions Law (1818, 2 vols.):—The Pentateuch, or The Five Books of Moses, illustrated (1818), and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Claphius (or Elaphius). A letter exists ad dressed to him about A.D. 477, from Sidonius Apollinaris, bishop of Clermont, in the 5th century. Sidonius promises to go to Rouergue to dedicate a church which Claphus had built, and expresses a great desire to see him some day bishop of it, when God should have allayed the persecution of the Visigoths.

Clapp, Andrew Josiah, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1833. He graduated from Amherst College in 1858, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1861; was ordained Feb. 19, 1862, and was stated supply at Shutesbury, Mass., from 1862 until his death, Sept. 13, 1863. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 218.

Clapp, Caleb, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was made rector of the Church of the Nativity, in New York city, not long after his graduation from the General Theological Seminary, and was connected with that Church for many years. He died Jan. 29, 1878, aged sixty-seven years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 168.

Clapp, Joel, D.D., an eminent minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Montgomery, Vt., Sept. 4, 1793. His father, captain Joshua Clapp, was one of two brothers, both of whom served through the war of the Revolution. The father moved from Worcester County, Mass., to Montgomery, Vt., and for two years his family was the only one in town, Joel being the first child born there. In 1810 he entered the University of Vermont, at Burlington, but the death of his father in the fall of 1811 compelled him to leave. After being admitted to practice law he relinquished it and studied theology. In 1818 he was ordained deacon, and priest in the following year. Soon after his ordination he organized three parishes in Montgomery, Berkshire, and Shelburne, and became rector of Trinity Church, in the last named, Oct. 27, 1819. For eight years he devoted himself to this parish, performing, in addition, a vast amount of missionary work. In 1828 he resigned his charge in Shelburne, and officiated alternately at Bethel and Woodstock. In 1832 he accepted a call to Gardiner, Me., remaining eight years, and during that period was delegate from that diocese to the General Convention. In 1840 he was again rector of the Church in Woodstock, and in 1848 became pastor at Bellows Falls. He removed, in 1858, to the diocese of New York, and was instituted rector of St. Philip's, Philipstown. Having accepted the post of chaplain and superintendent of the Home for the Aged and Orphans, at Brooklyn, in January, 1860, his health proved unequal to its duties, and he withdrew to the rectoryship of the parishes of Montgomery and Berkshire, Vt., a short time before his death, which occurred at Claremont, N. H., Feb. 24, 1861. Dr. Clapp represented the diocese in seven sessions of the General Convention; was thirteen years secretary of the Diocesan Convention; seven years president of the Standing Committee, and in 1848 was appointed one of the Board of Agents for the management of its lands in Vermont by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. His mental endowments were rather solid than brilliant; he was a man of extraordinary candor, was a most judicious counsellor. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1861, p. 386.

Clapp, Margaret, wife of Allen Clapp of Philadelphia, was a minister of the Society of Friends (Orthodox). She died March 7, 1835, aged fifty-nine years. See The Friend, viii, 200.

Clapp, Sumner Gallup, a Congregational minister, was born at Easthampton, Mass., March 10, 1800. He graduated from Yale College in 1822, taught at the academy in New Castle, Me., for two years following, and graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1827. He was ordained pastor of the Church in Enfield, Mass., Jan. 9, 1828. In 1834, by appointment of the Hampshire Association, he did missionary service for three months in Canada East. In 1837 he was installed at Cabotville, now Chicopee, from which he was dismissed, Jan. 22, 1850. After preaching three months in Orono, Me., he began preaching in St. Johnsbury, Vt., in November, 1850, in which place he was installed pastor of the South Church, Jan. 14, 1852, and was dismissed in 1855. In October of that year he became pastor in Sturbridge, Mass., and retired from the position in 1862. In 1864 and 1865 he was acting pastor at Lyndon, Vt., after which he ceased from the active ministry, and resided at Dorchester, Mass. He died in Boston, Jan. 26, 1869. See Cong. Quarterly, 1869, p. 300.

Clapp, Theodore, a Universalist minister, was born at Easthampton, Mass., in 1782. He studied at Williams College, but graduated from Yale in 1814; pursued his theological researches for one year at Andover, and was licensed as a Presbyterian minister in 1817. In 1822 he was ordained pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of New Orleans, where he acquired great celebrity as a pulpit orator. Some ten or twelve years later he was deposed from his Church office for heresy, and was afterwards known as an independent minister, cherishing Unitarian and Universalist opinions, but continued to occupy his former pulpit in New Orleans for ten years more, when he retired to Louisville, where he died, May 16, 1866. See Universalist Register, 1867, p. 73.

Clapp, Warren Benjamin, a Baptist minister, was born in New York city in 1827. He graduated from Brown University in 1848, from the Rochester Theological Seminary in 1855, and was ordained at Dover, N. H., in 1856, where he remained six years. He was stated supply at Milford from 1863 to 1865, and died at Wappinger's Falls, N. Y., Sept. 27, 1865. See Gen. Cat. of Rochester Theol. Sem. p. 12. (J. C. S.)

Clapp, William Thompson, a Congregational minister, was born at Hudson, O., April 12, 1838. In the winter of 1853-4 he was converted; in 1857 graduated at the Western Reserve College, and in 1862 at Union Theological Seminary, N. Y. The next year he remained at home, in Hudson, studying, and preaching in the Presbyterian Church at Streetsborough. He was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Edinburg, O., in 1864, and died there March 18, 1865. He was a clear, earnest, and elegant preacher. His sermons were prepared with great care, but he cared for nothing except to do good in the name of Christ. See Cong. Quarterly, 1865, p. 425.

Clapperton, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, was appointed, in 1570, the first minister of the Reformed faith at Livingston, and was transferred to Hutton in 1571 as the first Protestant minister at that place. He was a member of the convention at Leith in 1572. In 1574 three other places were added to his charge. He was transferred to Lenuel (now Coldstream) in 1576; appointed visitor of Merce and Lammernmuir several times, and in 1583 was visitor from Forth to Berwick. In 1584 he was arrested and taken to Edinburgh for not giving obedience to his Ordinary. He was chosen constant moderator of the presbytery in 1606, but the synod required him to resign that office. He was a member of sixteen general assemblies, and died in 1617. Calderwood says, "He was ambitious, and ready to embrace any preferment." See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, i, 192, 432, 440.

Clapperton, John (2), a Scotch clergyman, one of the foregoing, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1615; was presented to the living of Ednam in 1617; in 1620 was permitted to transfer to the next adjoining presbytery; was deposed before 1641, and died before Aug. 25, 1655. See Fasti Eccles. Scotticane, i, 459.

Clapperton, John (3), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1642; was presented to the living at Yetholm in 1662; resigned as 1666; was transferred to Yarrow the same year, and died in 1679, aged about fifty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 476, 563.

Clapson, RICHARD, an English Congregational minister, was born at Maidstone, Sept. 2, 1794. He joined the Church in early manhood; received his ministerial training at Hackney College, and settled at Exmouth, where he continued during life, and died May 17, 1865. Much of his usefulness at Exmouth is traceable to the pledge he took and kept, for the sake of others, of entire abstinence from all intoxicants. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1866, p. 241.

Clare, JOHN, an English Baptist minister, was born at Ashton, Berkshire, in 1776. He was educated among the Independents, but joined the Baptists when between eighteen and nineteen years of age; and having already written short sermons as "an amusement and an exercise," he now frequently "exercised his gifts" in some of the leading Baptist churches in the vicinity. At length he became pastor in the village of Downton, where he remained for more than thirty-seven years, securing in eminent degree the affections of his flock, and making "full proof of his ministry." He died near the close of 1840. See (Lond.) Baptist Magazine, 1842, p. 165-170. (J. C. S.)

Clarehue, WILLIAM, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1700; appointed to the living at Culsalmond in 1711; ordained in 1712; transferred to Kindar in 1719, but returned. He died May 13, 1733. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 579, 663.

Clarentius, Saint, bishop of Vienne, in France, lived in the early part of the 7th century, and is commemorated on his birthday, April 25.

Claridge, RICHARD, an English clergyman, and an eminent writer among the Quakers, was born in October, 1649, at Farmborough, in Warwickshire, where he received his early education. In 1666 he entered Balliol College, Oxford, but removed to St. Mary's Hall, where he took his bachelor's degree in 1670. He received ordination soon after, and in 1673 took charge of the rectory of Peopleton, Worcestershire, but resigned it in 1691, and the same year became a Baptist. In 1697 he joined the Quakers, and continued a member and preacher among them until his death, Feb. 28, 1723. The following are some of his works: Baptism and the Supper:—The Doctrine of the Trinity:—Tithes:—Liberty of Conscience. See Piety Promoted, ii, 361; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clarisse, Johannes, a Dutch theologian, was born at Schiedam in 1770. In 1803 he was professor of theology at Harderwick; in 1811, preacher at Amsterdam; in 1815, doctor and professor of theology at Leyden, where he died in 1843. He is the author of Encyclopædiæ Theologicæ Epitome (Leyden, 1832, 1835):—Diss. Exeg.-theol. de Spiritu Sancto (Utrecht, 1791; Dutch transl. ibid. 1795):—Scholæ Theologicæ Præsertim Apologeticæ (ibid. 1841). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 3, 424, 537; ii, 67; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 257. (B. P.)

Clarisse, Theodor Adrian, a Dutch theologian, was doctor and professor of theology at Gröningen, and died at Leyden, Sept. 25, 1828. He is the author of Psalmi 15 Hammaälth Illustrati (Leyden, 1819):—Prælio de Societatis Christ. Historia, etc. (Gröningen, 1824):—De Athenagoræ Vita et Scriptis, etc. (Leyden, 1819):—Vierlert Leerredenen (Rotterdam, 1814):—Leerredenen (Amsterdam, 1817):—Nieuwe Leerredenen (ibid. 1823). See First, Bibl. Jud. i, 180; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 209, 530, 537, 834; ii, 111. (B. P.)

Clarissens. See CLARE, ST., NUNS OF.

Clark, Abner, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Salem, N. H., May 1, 1788. He was converted when twelve years old; joined the Church in 1807, and in the following year was received into the New England Conference, wherein he served the Church with much acceptance and usefulness until his death, Feb. 20, 1814. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1814, p. 242.

Clark, Albert Brown, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Schellsburg, Bedford Co., Pa. He graduated at Dickinson College, and at the Western Theological Seminary; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Carlisle in 1841, and called to supply the Church at Bedford; was next ordained pastor at Ligonier. While there he established a female seminary, which he successfully conducted. He served one year as financial agent of Washington College. His last charge was Altoona, Pa., where he labored with success until his death in 1863. He stood high in the Presbytery of Huntingdon. (W. P. S.)

Clark, Albert G., a Universalist minister, was born at Preston, Chenango Co., N. Y., Sept. 21, 1811. He received a liberal education; began school-teaching at the age of seventeen; commenced the study of theology in 1835, and in 1837 was ordained to the ministry. After laboring several years as missionary at Upper Lisle, he removed successively to Speedsville; to McLean, in 1840; to Beaver Dam, in 1851; to Branchport, in 1856; to McLean again, in 1860, and, in 1861, to De Ruyter (all in New York), where he remained until his death, Nov. 28, 1873. Mr. Clark was an active and efficient agent in the circulation of his denominational literature; a zealous and untiring preacher; pure in his private life, genial in his manners, kind-hearted and full of sympathy. See Universalist Register, 1875, p. 123.

Clark, Albion Byron, a Baptist minister, was born at Sharon, Me., March 24, 1826, and graduated at Waterville College in 1851. For two and a half years he was principal of the Shelburne Falls, Mass., Academy, and then entered the Newton Theological Institution, but did not complete the full course of study. He was ordained in Skowhegan (then Bloomfield), Sept. 12, 1855, where he was very successful for three years and a half, but was obliged to resign on account of ill-health, in the spring of 1859. For the next three years and more he was an agent of the American Baptist Publication Society, and then accepted a call to the pastorate of a Church in Columbia, Cal. He preached only three months, and for more than two years was disabled by disease. Brought back to his Eastern home, he died in Skowhegan, Me., Sept. 9, 1865. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Alexander (1), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister of Tron Church, Glasgow, took his degree at the university there in 1727; was licensed to preach in 1731; presented to the living at Neilston in 1732; ordained in 1733, and died Sept. 8, 1786, aged thirty-two years. There was then no more acceptable minister or preacher in the west of Scotland. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 230.

Clark, Alexander (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1813; was licensed to preach in 1821; presented to the third charge at Inverness in 1822; transferred to the first charge in that town in 1834, and died May 6, 1852, aged fifty-five years. He was remarkably zealous and active on the popular side in all the proceedings of the Church. He published Rights of Members of the Church of Scotland (1831):—five single Sermons (1831-46):—Present Position of the Church, and the Duty of its Members (1840):—Dialogues, i-vii, on the Questions Agitated in the Church of Scotland (1843); five of which were translated into Gaelic. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 255, 259.

Clark, Allen, a Congregationalist minister, was born at Chaplin, Conn., Oct. 25, 1817; graduated at Connecticut Theological Institute in 1849, and was ordained as an evangelist at Windham, Aug. 8, of the same year.

For some time he labored as home missionary in Dover, Ill., and was afterwards agent of the American Home Missionary Society in Connecticut. He was installed as pastor of the First Church, Stafford, Conn., March 19, 1851, and died in Windham, Dec. 26, 1852. See Hist. Cat. of the Conn. Theol. Inst., p. 56. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Almon, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born about 1828. He was converted in 1852; licensed to preach, and admitted into the North Indiana Conference in 1855; and died Oct. 16, 1857. Mr. Clark was laborious, faithful, intellectual, a kind pastor, and a bold advocate of the Christian religion. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1858, p. 67.

Clark, Anson, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector, in 1853, at Elyria, O., and the following year at Rockford, Ill. Here he remained until 1861, when he began serving St. Matthew's Church in Cambridge; the next year he resided in Dement without charge; in 1866 he removed to Medina, O.; in 1870 he officiated in St. Paul's Church, in that town, and continued so to do until 1873, when he was appointed a missionary at large. He died at Medina, Nov. 19, 1876. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 168.

Clark, Avery, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Springfield, Mass., in 1818. He was converted in 1849, in Iowa, where he had taken up his residence in 1846; was licensed in 1854, and in May, 1856, was ordained at a session of the Delaware and Clayton Quarterly Meeting. After preaching a few years, he enlisted in the Federal army, Jan. 1, 1863, but did not lose sight of his vocation as a minister. He fell in battle, Sept. 3, 1863, at White Stone Hill, west of Sioux City. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1864, p. 91. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Azariah, a Congregational minister, graduated at Williams College in 1805; was ordained pastor of the Church in New Canaan, N. Y., March 18, 1807; and died in 1832, aged fifty-four years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 303.

Clark, Benjamin Franklin, a Congregational minister, was born at Lyndeborough, N. H., Feb. 23, 1808. His preparatory studies were in Marysville, Tenn., and Oxford, O.; in 1833 he graduated at the Miami University, and the following year became principal of Rising Sun Seminary, in Indiana; in 1837 he graduated at Lane Seminary, and for seven months of the following year preached at Lyndeborough. In 1839 he resided at Andover until August, when he was ordained pastor in North Chelmsford, Mass., remaining there until January, 1869, but resided in that place without charge thereafter. In 1870, however, he supplied the First Church in Dracut; in 1868 and in 1870 was a state senator; for twenty years was a director of the Stony Brook Railroad, and for about the same length of time superintendent of schools in Chelmsford. His death occurred May 28, 1879. He was the author of several pamphlets in reference to public affairs. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 15.

Clark, Burrell, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Uniontown, Ala., in 1847. He joined the Church in 1870; soon became a local preacher, and in 1873 entered the Mississippi Conference, wherein he served with marked zeal and success until his decease, May 17, 1875. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 14; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Clark, Caleb (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born at New Salem, Mass., in 1790. He graduated at Middlebury College, Vt., in 1814, and studied theology under Rev. Dr. Theophilus Packard. He served the Church in Trenton, N. Y., from 1820 to 1830, and at intervals afterwards, as stated supply, and was clerk of the Presbytery of Cortland from 1825 to 1830. He died Oct. 24, 1863, leaving eighteen thousand dollars to the Presbyterian Board of Publication and the Board of Foreign Missions. Mr. Clark was a man of decided ability, well informed in science and literature, and careful in Biblical study." See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1864, p. 296.

Clark, Caleb (2), a Baptist minister, was born in Canaan, N. H., July 4, 1796. He was converted in 1814, licensed about 1816, went to Waterville, Me., and pursued a course of study, after completing which he was ordained pastor of the Church in Rumney, N. H., Jan. 25, 1826, his labors there being followed by a revival of religion. He next became pastor of the Second Church in Haverhill, Mass.; in 1828 he removed to Pittsfield, Mass., and was pastor there two years. After this he was in Dover, N. H., and labored in Massachusetts and Maine. While visiting his friends in Rumney, he suddenly died, March 26, 1840. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Calvin, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Westhampton, Mass., March 27, 1805. He graduated from Williams College in 1832, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1835. He entered the home missionary work in Michigan in September of the same year, and, with the exception of four years, when he was in Chicago as district secretary of the American Board, had spent nearly forty-two years in the state of Michigan. He labored for a brief period as pastor, or stated supply, at Homer, Richland, and Hillsdale. He died suddenly at Marshall, Mich., June 4, 1877. (W. P. S.)

Clark, Charles Chapman, a Universalist minister, was born in Rumney, N. H., in August, 1813. He was a zealous Methodist in early life, but later embraced Universalism, and in 1841 was ordained a preacher of that faith at Thornton, N. H. His subsequent stations were at East Jaffrey and Brookline, N. H.; at Concord and Hartland, Vt.; at Susquehanna, Pa.; and at Essex, Pigeon Cove, and West Townsend, Mass. He died in Brattleborough, Vt., Oct. 14, 1878. Mr. Clark was a man of sound common-sense, sincere and devoted spirit, a useful and Scriptural preacher. See Universalist Register, 1879, p. 100.

Clark, Daniel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Webster, Me., Feb. 15, 1801. He joined the Church in 1825; received license to exhort the same year, to preach the following year, and in 1828 united with the Maine Conference. On the division of the Conference in 1848 he became a member of the East Maine Conference. Of the forty-three years of his ministerial life, twenty-nine were spent in the effective ranks, five in the local, and nine on the superannuated list. He died at his home in Richmond, Me., May 22, 1869. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1870, p. 151.

Clark, Davis Wessgatt, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born on the island of Mount Desert, off the coast of Maine, Feb. 25, 1812. He experienced conversion in his boyhood; gave up his intended project of a seafaring life, took earnestly to books, and at the age of nineteen had earned sufficient money by his own exertions and economy to start him at Wesleyan University, where he graduated in 1836. The next year he was a teacher in Amenia Seminary, N. Y., and the seven following years its principal. In 1843 he joined the New York Conference, and, after filling five appointments, was called to the editorship of the Ladies' Repository, which position, by two subsequent unanimous re-elections, he retained until 1864, when he was made bishop. He performed his episcopal duties with great zeal and activity, traveling extensively through the South, organizing the Holston, Georgia, and Alabama Conferences. In 1870 his health began to decline, but he nevertheless continued his labors in 1871, conducting the Lexington, Kentucky, and Western Virginia Conferences alone. He had an assistant in conducting the Pittsburgh and New England Conferences. After opening the New York Conference he was obliged to retire, from intense suffering, and on rallying a little he was taken to his home in Cincinnati, O., where he died, May 23, 1871. Bishop Clark was a man of decided convictions and great firmness of purpose. As a minister, he was able and successful; as a writer, clear, exact, and forcible; as is shown, not only in his sermons and editorials, but in his published works, such as his Mental Discipline:—Elements of Algebra:—Life and Times of Bishop Hedding, and Man All Immortal. As a bishop he occupied a high position, on account of his careful and systematic arrangement of his duties, and his prompt and accurate decisions. He was a bold and strong opposer of slavery, and a powerful advocate of liberal education, especially Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 283; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.; Alumni Record of West. Univ. 1882, p. 11, 551.

Clark, Dugan, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Randolph County, N. C., Oct. 3, 1783. He was converted when about eighteen years of age, united with the Methodists, and was an itinerant preacher for three years. Subsequently he became a member of the Society of Friends, was acknowledged as a minister in August, 1817, and labored in his own and the neighboring quarterly meetings. In 1822 and 1828, he visited the meetings of Ohio and Indiana; and in 1834 those in Philadelphia, New York, and New England. He and his wife had the superintendency of the New Garden Boarding School, from 1837 to 1843. In 1844 they went to Great Britain on a ministerial tour, and were absent a year. His last public labors were performed in 1854, in the Western and Southern States. He died Aug. 23, 1855. See The Friend, xv, 41, 42. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Edward, a Baptist minister, was born in Newport, R. I., June 6, 1739. He preached several years as a licensed minister, was ordained Aug. 18, 1801, at Attleborough, Mass., but never took charge of any particular church. For the last twenty years of his life the scene of his labors was chiefly in the towns of Framingham and Medfield. He died while on a visit to Mansfield, April 22, 1811. Mr. Clark possessed an uncommonly acute mind, and all his habits of thinking, writing, and preaching were remarkably correct. He was the author of several tracts, some of which were on baptism. See Baptist Missionary Magazine, iii, 190. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Elias, a Congregational minister, was born in Orange, Conn., July 12, 1814. He graduated from Union College in 1838, and studied in the Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., one year (1838-39), and also in the New Haven Divinity School one year (1839-40). He was ordained Jan. 7, 1851, was stated supply of the Congregational Church in Franklin, O., one year, and pastor in Egremont, Mass., six years, giving full proof of his ministry in bringing souls to Christ and edifying the Church. He next supplied the Church at Rochester, Minn., three years, and at Bellevue, Ia., three years, and finally at Ottumwa. He died at West Salem, Wis., Oct. 29, 1866. (W. P. S.)

Clark, Ephraim Weston, a Congregational minister, was born at Haverhill, N. H., April 25, 1799. He pursued his preparatory studies at Peacham, Vt., Bangor, Me., and Andover, Mass., graduated from Dartmouth College in 1824, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1827; was ordained in Brandon, Vt., Oct. 3, the same year, and sailed in the following November as a missionary to Honolulu, in the employ of the A. B. C. F. M., reaching his destination in March, 1828. While stationed in Honolulu he devoted a part of his time, until 1835, to seamen; was principal of the seminary at Lahaina until 1843; preached until August, 1848, at Wailuka; from 1848 to 1863 was pastor of the Kawaiahaeo Church in Honolulu. In 1856, and again in 1859, he visited America; and in 1864 arrived in New York to superintend the printing of the revised version of the Hawaiian Scriptures, issued by the American Bible Society. His residence from 1864 to 1867 was in

New York city; in 1867 and 1868, in Middletown, Conn.; from 1868 to 1873, in Portland; from that date his home was in Chicago, Ill., until his death, July 15, 1878. Mr. Clark was the first secretary of the Hawaiian Missionary Society. Among the books published by him in the Hawaiian language were several small text-books on Geometry, Trigonometry, and Surveying; also translations of The Little Philosopher:—First Lessons in Astronomy, besides several tracts, and a Bible Dictionary. See Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 39.

Clark, George (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1611; was presented to the living at Aberdour in 1614, and died Aug. 18, 1644, aged about fifty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 622.

Clark, George (2), a Scotch clergyman, concerning whom there was an act of the Assembly in 1648, and another in 1649, does not seem to have held a benefice till presented to Burutisland in 1672. He died before Aug. 1, 1688. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 531.

Clark, George (3), a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lenox, Mass., April 24, 1822. He graduated from Washington College in 1843, taught at Tallahassee, Fla., for two years thereafter, and graduated from Union Theological Seminary in 1848. He was, in 1849, pastor at St. Louis, Mo., was recalled to his former position as teacher at Tallahassee for one year, and died there, Dec. 24, 1850. See Gen. Cat. of Union Theol. Sem. p. 49.

Clark, George Henry, a Congregational minister, was born at Georgia, Vt., May 23, 1835. He fitted for college at Georgia and Bakersfield academies, and graduated from the University of Vermont in 1856, and from the Andover Theological Seminary in 1861. He was ordained at St. Johnsbury Centre in 1862; preached there a year, and then ill-health compelled him to return to his father's house, where he died, April 25, 1865. See Cong. Quarterly, 1865, p. 430.

Clark, Harvey, a Congregational minister, was born at Chester, Vt., Oct. 7, 1802; went to Oregon in 1840; was pastor at Forest Grove from 1845 to 1854, and died March 25, 1858. See Minutes of Oregon Association, 1858; Eels, Hist. of Cong. Association of Oregon and Washington Territory (Portland, Or.), 1881, p. 75.

Clark, Homer Jackson, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Mount Holly, Vt., Dec. 23, 1803. He experienced religion in early life, and in 1824 entered the Ohio Conference, but afterwards entered the Ohio State University at Athens, where he spent five years, and graduated with honor. In 1829 his name again appears on the Ohio Conference minutes, when he was sent to Pittsburgh, Pa. He was talented and popular, and soon attracted large crowds. In 1831 he received an appointment as professor in Madison College in Uniontown. After two more years in the pastorate, he, in 1834, became president and professor of moral science in Allegheny College, which position he held until 1844, when he took a superannuated relation. In 1850 he again entered the effective ranks; from 1852 to 1856 he was editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate; from thence to 1864 labored in the active itinerancy, and spent his after-years as a superannuate. He died at Homersville, Medina Co., O., Sept. 24, 1875. Dr. Clark was exceedingly amiable and sweet-spirited in disposition, a Christian gentleman in demeanor, eminent in scholarly attainments, unostentatious, the noblest type of a preacher and educator. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 83; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Clark, Ichabod, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born in Franklin County, Mass., Oct. 30, 1802. He was converted at fourteen, licensed at eighteen, and ordained at Scipio, N. Y., in 1823. He was pastor at Lockport, Lagrange, Batavia, Le Roy, Brockport, and Nunda (all in New York). The New York Baptist Convention appointed him, in 1848, missionary at Galena, Ill., in which state he remained, for the most part, during the rest of his life. For several years he was pastor at Rockford, his ministry being eminently successful. During a part of this pastorate he was superintendent of missions for that state. He was pastor five years again at Le Roy, N. Y., then once more acted as superintendent of missions in Illinois, and while serving for the second time as pastor at Lockport, N. Y., he died, April 14, 1869. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 226. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Jacob Lyman, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1807. He graduated from Trinity College in 1831, was ordained deacon in 1835, and was rector of St. John's Church, Waterbury, Conn., from 1837 until his death, Jan. 25, 1877. He was a member of the standing committee for twenty-three years, and declined an election to the episcopate of Nebraska and the North-west in 1859. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 168.

Clark, Jacob Starr, a Congregational minister, was born at Landaff, N. H., Jan. 10, 1792. He was ordained in Morgan, Vt., Jan. 11, 1827, and his active ministry ceased in 1864. He died Dec. 27, 1879, in St. Johnsbury, Vt. See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 16.

Clark, James (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1680; was licensed to preach in 1687; appointed to the living at Dunbar in 1688; was a member of the General Assembly in 1690; transferred to Inverwick in 1691; was a member of the assembly of 1692; transferred to Dirleton in 1697; and transferred to Tron Church, Glasgow, in 1702. He zealously opposed the union with England, and, on a fast day appointed by the assembly, he preached a sermon which so much roused the lower class of people that they arose, threatened the authorities, and took possession of the city of Glasgow. After a life of piety, usefulness, and popularity, he died in 1724, aged about sixty-four years. He published, Memento Mori: a Word to the Healthful, Sick, and Dying (Edinb. 1698):—Personal Culling, or the Communicant's Best Token (ibid. 1697):—Presbyterial Government of the Church of Scotland Methodically Described (ibid. 1701):—On Ruling Elders (ibid. 1705):—On Propagating Christianity in Scotland (ibid. 1710):—Remarks on the Overtures Concerning Kirk-Sessions (1720). See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 327, 369, 375; ii, 11.

Clark, James (2), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1786; appointed to the living at Elie in 1797, and ordained, having been appointed morning lecturer, assistant at St. Andrew's Church, Edinburgh, and chaplain to the 3d Battalion of Edinburgh Volunteers; was presented to the living in 1798, and died Aug. 18, 1831. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 426.

Clark, James (3), an English Baptist minister, was born at Fulbourne, Cambridgeshire, in 1792. He united with the Little Wild Street Church, London, and was one of the earliest students of Stepney College. He was pastor in Biggleswade in 1816, and after a short time removed to Guildsbrough, Northamptonshire, where he remained for twenty years. In 1839 he resigned, purposing not to settle again. He took up his residence in Edinburgh, and was instrumental in the formation of a Baptist Church, for which he preached for a time. He spent the closing years of his life in Bristol and Leamington. During this period he published a work entitled Outlines of Theology, in 3 vols. He died Aug. 26, 1862. See (Lond.) Baptist Handbook, 1863, p. 113. (J. C. S.)

Clark, James A., a Baptist minister, was born at Washington, Berkshire Co., Mass., in 1828. He studied at Shelburne Falls Academy, and graduated from Williams College in 1853. Immediately afterwards he was offered the position of tutor in the college, but he declined, preferring to teach in the academy at Shelburne Falls. He entered the Newton Theological Institution, and graduated in 1857. Soon after he became pastor of the Church in Adrian, Mich., and then of the Church in Fairfield. From 1861 to 1864 he was professor in the Kalamazoo College. In 1864 he became the editor of the Michigan Christian Herald, at Detroit, and when that paper was merged in the Chicago Standard, in 1867, he held the position of corresponding editor for the remainder of his life. Returning to Kalamazoo in 1867, he entered upon the duties of professor of Latin, and held also the office of treasurer of the college. He engaged with great zeal and earnestness in the work of securing for that institution a better pecuniary endowment; and in his endeavors he met with much success, but at the expense of his health. He died Aug. 17, 1869. See Chicago Standard, Aug. 19, 1869. (J. C. S.)

Clark, James Augustus, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lebanon, Conn., Aug. 15, 1808. He studied at Middlebury Academy, graduated from Yale College in 1834, was a student of Princeton Theological Seminary nearly two years, and graduated from Yale Divinity School in 1837. He was licensed by the New Haven West Association, Aug. 2, 1836, and while studying at New Haven supplied various churches; was ordained by Schuyler Presbytery at Canton, Ill., Sept. 25, 1838; was the first permanent Presbyterian minister in Iowa, supplying the Church at Fort Madison from 1838 to 1849; returned to Connecticut, and supplied Woodstock Congregational Church in 1850; Deep River Church, in Saybrook, from December, 1850, until November, 1853; Hanover Church, in Meriden, from December, 1853, until April, 1855; the Church at Southwick, Hampden Co., Mass., from 1855 to 1858; was installed pastor of Cromwell Church, Conn., June 16, 1858, and was released from that charge Feb. 12, 1863; resided at Monterey, Mass., from 1864 to 1870, and preached in that vicinity. He was received, April 18, 1871, into membership in Columbia Presbytery, New York; supplied the Church at Spencertown, from 1870 till 1873; then resided and labored at Laneseborough, Mass., from 1873 till 1877; and finally supplied the Church at Hillsdale, N. Y., from 1877 until his death, which occurred July 1, 1881, at Ridgfield, Bergen Co., N. J. See Norval Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 30; New York Observer, Nov. 3, 1881.

Clark, Jane, a minister of the Society of Friends, of the Yonge Street Monthly Meeting, Canada, was born in 1811. For ten years she served the Church acceptably as an elder, and in 1869 was acknowledged as a minister, in which vocation she rendered good service to the cause of her master. She died near Bond Head, Ontario, Sept. 1, 1875. See Friends' Review, xxxix, 346. (J. C. S.)

Clark, John (1), a Presbyterian minister, received his license from the Presbytery of New Brunswick, May 9, 1760, and was ordained and settled at the Forks of the Delaware, Oct. 13, 1762. In 1767, on account of bodily infirmity, he resigned his charge and removed to Maryland, where he became pastor of two churches in Baltimore County. In 1775 his pastoral relations was again dissolved, but he continued to preach to one of his churches until 1781. In this year he removed to western Pennsylvania, and became pastor of the united churches of Bethel and Lebanon, in that region. He died July 13, 1797. As a preacher, Mr. Clark was solemn and impressive. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Clark, John (2), an English Baptist minister, was born at Fulbourne, Cambridge, in 1790. He was brought up on a farm, left home at the age of twelve, went to London, and in 1811 was converted and baptized, and joined the Church in Little Wild Street. In 1813 he entered Stepney College. In 1817 he was ordained over the Church at Folkestone, Kent; in 1823 he was called to Long Buckby, Northampton, but removed to Uphill, Folkestone, where he gathered a small Church, and remained its pastor till his death, May 14, 1850. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1850, p. 368.

Clark, John (3), a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Maine in 1793. His parents being in straitened circumstances, were unable to do much in the way of giving him an education. He had reached the age of thirty-eight before he was ordained to the work of the ministry, yet he preached for nearly forty years. His last residence was in Prospect, Me., where he died, Aug. 8, 1871. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1873, p. 83. (J. C. S.)

Clark, John (4), a Scotch clergyman, was tutor in the family of the lord chief baron Dundas; was licensed to preach in 1807; presented to the living at Blackford in 1815, and ordained. He died Dec. 31, 1861, aged eighty-one years. He was a man of great penetration and shrewdness, of whom clever strokes of humor are related. He published An Account of the Parish. See Fasts Eccles. Scotticane, ii, 752.

Clark, John (5), A.M., a Scotch clergyman of Glasgow, was licensed to preach in 1819; was elected minister at New Street Chapel, Edinburgh, in 1823, and ordained; promoted to the Second Charge, Canon-gate, in 1833; transferred to the Old Church in 1844, and died Sept. 1, 1859, aged seventy years. See Fasts Eccles. Scotticane, i, 90, 91.

Clark, John Flavel, a Congregational minister, was born in New Jersey. He graduated from Princeton College in 1807, spent somewhat more than a year in Andover Theological Seminary, and was tutor in his alma mater from 1811 to 1814. He was ordained in 1815; was pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Flemington, N. J., from 1815 to 1836; at Paterson from 1837 to 1841, at Cold Spring, N. Y., the next five years; at Oyster Bay, L. I., in 1845 and 1846; at Fishkill, N. Y., in 1847, and died there, Oct. 7, 1853. See Tricu. Cut. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 23.

Clark, John W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Harford County, Md., Sept. 21, 1803. He removed, while quite young, with his parents to Hamilton County, O.; experienced religion when a boy; received license to exhort at the age of eighteen; in 1824 to preach, and in 1825 entered the Ohio Conference, where he was faithful and laborious until his death, Aug. 26, 1862. Mr. Clark was silent and unobtrusive in manner, highly exemplary in his every-day life, an excellent preacher, and a model pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 137.

Clark, Jonas, a Congregational minister, was born at Newton, Mass., Dec. 25, 1730. He graduated from Harvard College in 1752, was ordained pastor of the Church in Lexington, Nov. 5, 1755, and remained there more than half a century. In consequence of inadequate salary he was compelled to cultivate a farm. He died at Lexington, Nov. 15, 1805. As a preacher he was awarded a high rank among his brethren, being animated in manner and instructive in matter. As a patriot, during the war of the Revolution, he was ardent and decided. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 514.

Clark, Joseph (1), D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Elizabeth, N. J., Oct. 21, 1751. In his twentieth year he began a course of study, graduated from Princeton College, and was licensed to preach by the New Brunswick Presbytery, April 23, 1783. In 1788 he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church at Allentown, where he remained, performing his work faithfully and earnestly, until 1796, when he removed to New Brunswick, and remained until the close of his life, Oct. 19, 1813. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 446.

Clark, Joseph (2), a Presbyterian minister, was born near Carlisle, Pa., Oct. 11, 1825. He was educated at the New Bloomfield Academy, graduated from Marshall College, Mercersburg, Pa., in 1848, and studied in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny. He was licensed by the Carlisle Presbytery in June, 1852, and became pastor at Chambersburg, where he labored faithfully until his death, June 7, 1865. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 99; Index to Princeton Rec.

Clark, Joseph Sylvester, D.D., an eminent Congregational minister, was born of Puritan ancestry at Manomet Ponds, South Plymouth, Mass., Dec. 19, 1800. A part of his youth was spent in teaching. He entered the academy at Amherst in 1822; in 1827 graduated from the college; in 1831 from Andover Theological Seminary, and was ordained successor to Dr. Alvan Bond at Sturbridge. His ministry there of seven years was very successful. In 1839 he was appointed secretary of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, and resigned the office in 1857. His labors in behalf of this interest were intense, and of very great value. In 1857 he was appointed corresponding secretary of the Congregational Library Association, "a position very congenial to his taste, especially as it afforded him so good an opportunity to gather up and arrange, so as to preserve, memorials of the Puritans, in books, pamphlets, manuscripts, paintings, etc." In 1859 the association commenced the publication of the Congregational Quarterly, and Dr. Clark was appointed one of the editors. He died at South Plymouth, Aug. 17, 1861. Dr. Clark was noted for piety, faithfulness to every trust committed to him, and a herculean diligence. He wrote, An Historical Sketch of Sturbridge, Mass. (1838, 48 pp.):—Historical Sketch of the Congregational Churches of Massachusetts, from 1620 to 1858 (1858, 12mo). He was engaged also upon a History of Amherst College. See Cong. Quarterly, 1862, p. 1; 1861, p. 384.

Clark, Justus McKinstry, a Presbyterian minister, was born on the Isle La Motte, in Lake Champlain, Vt., Dec. 27, 1811. In 1820 he removed with his parents to Franklin County, N. Y. He was converted when seventeen years of age, and soon after entered Vermont University, remaining two years, and graduated from Union College, N. Y., in 1835. In 1838 he was ordained by Transylvania Presbytery, and became pastor at Springfield, Ky. He soon removed to Ottawa, Ill., and in 1840 became pastor at Madison, Wis. In 1843 he was appointed chaplain at Fort Winnebago; and finally returned to Ottawa, where he died, Feb. 10, 1867. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 193.

Clark, Laban, D.D., a pioneer Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Haverhill, N. H., July 19, 1778, of strict Congregational parents, who gave him a careful Calvinistic education. He spent his childhood and youth at Bradford, Vt., where his associations with a Wesleyan family won him to Methodism; and on the arrival of a Methodist itinerant in the vicinity, he joined with others in forming a society. In 1800 he was licensed to exhort, and the following year received into the New York Conference, in which for more than half a century he occupied many of the most important stations and positions. In 1851 he became superannuated, which relation he held to the close of his life, Nov. 28, 1868. Mr. Clark was a very popular preacher, sound, instructive, argumentative, practical. He was an extensive reader, possessed a remarkably retentive memory, was amiable, calm, and devout. He figured prominently as one of the founders of the Methodist Episcopal Missionary society, and of Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn., where he spent his later life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1869, p. 97.

Clark, Lemen Taylor, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born about 1845. He was brought up in Mercer County, O.; was converted at the age of thirteen; graduated at the Ohio Wesleyan University in 1871; became superintendent of the Defiance public schools; and in 1873 entered the Central Ohio Conference, wherein he labored with much acceptance until his death, Dec. 1, 1878. Mr. Clark was a man of rare scholarship, frank and genial nature, and earnest piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 99.

Clark, Lewis, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Easthampton, Mass., July 26, 1813. He had a careful religious training; experienced religion in 1830; received license to exhort in 1833, to preach in 1835; spent several years studying at Wilbraham Academy, and served under the presiding elders until 1840, when he entered the Erie Conference. In 1863 he became superannuated, but continued to preach at least once each Sabbath until his death, March 4, 1876. Mr. Clark was well-read, honest, and uniform in piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 124; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Clark, Lewis Franklin, a Congregational minister, was born at Southampton, Mass., Sept. 11, 1812. In 1830 he entered Sheldon Academy, in his native town, and graduated with honor from Amherst College in 1837, having taught school in various places in Hampshire County during his academic and collegiate courses. He graduated from the Andover Theological Seminary in 1841, and afterwards taught two terms in the Academy at Southampton, preaching occasionally at the same time. June 1, 1842, he was ordained pastor in Whitinsville, in the town of Northbridge, and there he remained until his death, Oct. 13, 1870. As a preacher Mr. Clark was plain and simple in style and manner; but as a pastor he had more than ordinary gifts, and greatly endeared himself to his people. See Cong. Quarterly, 1872, p. 318.

Clark, Lorin, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in America, N. Y., Dec. 29, 1797, of Baptist parents. He joined the Presbyterians in his nineteenth year; studied two years in an academy at Lenox, Mass., and there becoming a Methodist, received license to preach, and in 1823 entered the New York Conference, wherein he labored with great diligence, devotedness, and marked success. He became superannuated in 1858, and died Jan. 29, 1868. Mr. Clark was able in ministerial qualifications, and exemplary in life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 77.

Clark, Luther, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Canterbury, Conn., May, 1792. He attended Princeton Theological Seminary a few months in 1822; was ordained evangelist by the Presbytery of North River, April 28, 1825; preached in the Congregational Church at Plymouth, N. Y., from 1827 to 1834, and at Dryden from 1835 to 1845, and died at Lisbon, Conn., Aug. 28, 1845. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. p. 38.

Clark, Martin, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Patrick County, Va., Oct. 3, 1801. He removed, when about eight years old, with his parents to Williamson County, Tenn., where he received a good education. He was converted in 1820; commenced preaching in 1824, and continued in the local ranks until 1841, when he entered the Tennessee Conference. In it he was effective many years in succession, but at length became a supernumerary, and died Feb. 25, 1859. Mr. Clark was remarkable for zeal and punctuality. He possessed good natural endowments, a commanding person, a clear, musical voice, and great physical endurance. Cheerful in temperament, always happy, he was a source of consolation and joy everywhere. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1859, p. 114.

Clark, Mary, an English minister of the Society of Friends, the wife of John Clark, a tradesman in London, very soon after the rise of the Quakers in that city united with that sect. She was recognised as a minister about 1655, and travelled in Worcestershire "to ex-postulate with the local magistracy respecting their cruel treatment of Friends." One of her experiences, while thus occupied, was her being placed in the stocks at Evesham for three hours on the market-day, and exposure to other sufferings. In 1657 she went to America, arriving in Boston the latter part of June. Immediately on landing a warrant for her arrest as a "pestilent heretic" was issued, and before being committed to prison she was whipped, twenty strokes, with a heavy, three-corded whip, "laid on with fury," being inflicted upon her. After being kept a prisoner three months, she was banished and went to Rhode Island, the asylum of the oppressed for conscience' sake. She was occupied in religious service in New England until the early part of 1668, when, with two of her companions, she was shipwrecked and drowned. See Bowden, Hist. of the Friends in America, i. 126. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Nathan Sears, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Rochester, Mass., Feb. 7, 1807. He was converted at the age of eleven, and began his ministry when twenty years old, among the Reformed Methodists. On the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church he united with it, but in 1872 joined the Western New York Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He died March 3, 1873. Mr. Clark was a cordial, sympathetic, eminently charitable man. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 110.

Clark, Nathaniel Catlin, a Congregational minister, was born at Benson, Vt., Aug. 12, 1801. After studying for a time with Rev. Mr. Cushman, of Fairhaven, Vt., he completed his preparatory studies at Castleton Academy, and graduated in 1828 from Middlebury College. He spent one year teaching in Herkimer Academy, and in 1832 graduated from Auburn Theological Seminary. During the winter he supplied the church at Shoreham, Vt., and although invited to become the pastor of that church, he accepted, instead, after his ordination, May 4, 1833, a commission from the American Home Missionary Society, to preach in Cook County, Ill., which then embraced nearly a third of the State. He gathered a Church at Napierville, and ministered there a little more than three years, during which time he organized several other churches. In 1837 he went to St. Charles and preached in the church at that place and in the one at Elgin on alternate Sabbaths. At the latter place he was installed pastor in 1839, and thereafter made it his home. The churches at Udina, Dundee, Kingwood, and Marengo also shared his services from one to three years each. Under a general commission from the American Home Missionary Society he labored, in addition to the fields above noted, for several years in destitute communities. He had no regular charge during the last eight years of his life, but preached as a supply, with little intermission. He died at Elgin, Ill., Dec. 3, 1872. See Cong. Quarterly, 1873, p. 577.

Clark, Neil, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1676; became schoolmaster in Glassary; conformed to prelacy, and was examined for a license in 1688; was called to the living at Kiln-glass (now Strachur) in 1690, and ordained; and died before May 17, 1692, aged about thirty-six years. See Fusti Eccles. Scotica, iii, 32.

Clark, Nelson, a Congregational minister, was born at Brookfield, Vt., Aug. 13, 1813. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1838, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1842, after serving one year as tutor in Western Reserve College. He was ordained at Randolph, Vt., July 16, 1844, and remained there until April 7, 1846. The next three years he was acting pastor at Charlton, Mass. From January, 1850, to April, 1858, he was pastor in Quincy; from 1858 to 1865, acting pastor in Tiverton, R. I.; from 1865 to 1871, at Somerset, Mass. From 1871 to 1873, pastor in Rochester; from 1873 to 1878, acting pastor in Clearwater, Minn.; in 1879, resided without charge at Stillwater; in December of that year became acting pastor at National and at Garnavillo, Ia., and continued to hold this position until his death, at National, March 16, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 19.

Clark, Orin, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Marlborough, Mass., Jan. 2, 1788. He studied Latin grammar as he followed the plough, and afterwards entered the Episcopal Academy at Cheshire, Conn., and taught school during the winters; but intense application impaired his health. Having completed his course at the academy, he was ordained in October, 1811, and began his ministry as a missionary in Ontario and Genesee counties, N. Y. He accompanied bishop Hobart on his first visitation in that region in 1812, and shortly after became rector of Trinity Church, Geneva. Although a settled minister, he exercised a sort of supervision over the churches throughout Western New York. In the establishment of Geneva College he was prominent, was one of its original trustees, and held that office throughout his life. He died at Geneva, Feb. 24, 1828. In the pulpit Dr. Clark was bold and energetic, and was greatly beloved by his flock. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 540.

Clark, Perkins Kirkland, a Congregational minister, was born at Westfield, Mass., Dec. 8, 1811. After graduation at Yale College in 1838, he spent a year or more in Savannah, Ga., as a teacher, and in 1840 entered the theological seminary at Andover, Mass. In 1841 he transferred himself to the Yale Divinity School, where he finished the course in 1843. From 1842 till 1845 he was tutor in Yale College. The next year he taught in the normal school in Westfield, Mass., and resigned this position to engage in the work of the ministry, having been licensed to preach in August, 1842, by the Hampden Association. He supplied the pulpit of the Congregational Church in Chester village (now Huntington) from his ordination, Aug. 26, 1846, until 1852. He then accepted a call to Hinsdale, where he was installed over the Congregational Church, June 16, 1852. He resigned this charge Oct. 2, 1855, on account of ill-health. Having partially recovered, he began, in May, 1856, to supply the First Church in South Deerfield, where he remained until Sept. 26, 1865. He was installed over the Congregational Church in West Springfield, Jan. 16, 1866, and was dismissed from this charge April 18, 1871, to accept a call to the First Church in Charlemont. He died Jan. 4, 1872. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1872.

Clark, Peter (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Watertown, Mass., about 1693. He graduated in 1712 at Harvard College, and was invited, Aug. 7, 1716, to become the pastor at Salem (now Danvers), and was installed June 5, 1717. He died in June, 1768. In the latter part of his life he became involved in a controversy with the Rev. Samuel Webster of Salisbury, concerning the doctrine of original sin, and displayed no ordinary skill in dealing with the subject. His preaching was energetic in denunciation and pathetic in appeal. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 291.

Clark, Peter (2), a Baptist minister, was born at Gilmanton, N. H., Oct. 8, 1791. He joined the Free-will Baptists in June, 1798; was ordained Jan. 8, 1810, and became the pastor of the Church in Gilmanton. He died Nov. 28, 1865. Mr. Clark took a prominent part in the temperance reformation in the region where he resided. He was a careful observer of men and things; possessed a tenacious memory, had a critical mind, and cultivated the habit of great exactness in his language. See Barrett, Memoirs of Eminent Preachers, p. 78-85. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Philetus, a Congregational minister, was born at Southampton, Mass., April 26, 1794. He entered Williams College, but graduated at Middlebury College in 1818. After some months devoted to the study of theology, he was licensed to preach in June, 1820, and became pastor in Townshend, Vt., Dec. 29, 1821, from which he was dismissed in 1824. After laboring two years at Weston and Londonderry, under the direction of the Vermont Domestic Missionary Society, he became pastor in Londonderry in the summer of 1827, retiring in 1830. For three years he was acting pastor in Clarendon; next ministered for nearly two years at South Granville, N. Y.; from Sept. 30, 1835, to May 23, 1843, pastor at Windsor, Mass., and then returned to Clarendon, Vt., for seven years, supplying destitute churches in the vicinity. In 1850 he removed to West Townshend, and organized a Church there. After seven years of service he went to Post Mill, preached one year, and then became acting pastor of the Church in Sharon in 1858; in 1869, supplied the Church in Wardsborough for several months, and then relinquished further regular service. He died at Memphis, Tenn., Feb. 5, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1875, p. 578.

Clark, Pitt, a Congregational minister, was born at Medfield, Mass., Jan. 15, 1763. He graduated at Harvard College in 1790; was ordained at Norton, July 3, 1793; and died Feb. 13, 1835. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 679.

Clark, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, native of Sutherland, and schoolmaster of Tongue, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1814; was licensed to preach in 1819; appointed minister at the Gaelic Chapel, Aberdeen, in 1822, having been a missionary at Eriboll previously. He was promoted to the Gaelic Chapel-of-ease, Glasgow, in 1823, thence to the living at Keanloch-bervie in 1834, and died April 15, 1856, aged seventy-two years. See Fasts Eccles. Scotticane, ii, 34; iii, 350, 481.

Clark, Ross, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Halifax, Vt., Oct. 27, 1809. He received a careful religious training from his pious mother; joined the Church in his twenty-second year, and in 1834 united with the Oneida Conference. He died Nov. 30, 1838. Mr. Clark was zealous in and devoted to his calling. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1839, p. 676.

Clark, R. H., an English Baptist minister, was born at Fulbourne, Cambridgeshire, in 1785. In early life he became a Christian, and was ordained, in 1824, as pastor of the Church at Long Buckley, Northamptonshire, where he remained from 1824 to 1832. For the next eight years he was pastor at Kingthorpe and Leighton Buzzard, and, in 1840, received an appointment as town missionary in Bury St. Edmunds. While filling this place, he supplied, for two or three years, the pulpit of the church at Feltwell, in Norfolk. He died Oct. 8, 1852. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1853, p. 43. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Samuel (1), a Congregational minister, was a graduate of Princeton College, and studied theology there. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Second Congregational Church at Kensington, Conn., in July, 1756, and continued there until his death, in November, 1775. Mr. Clark was a man of estimable qualities and a good preacher. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Clark, Samuel (2), a Unitarian minister, was a native of Brookline, Mass., and graduated from Harvard College in 1805. He was ordained pastor of a Church in Burlington, Vt., April 19, 1810, and died in 1827. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 244.

Clark, Samuel A., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was rector of a Church in Philadelphia for a number of years until 1858, when he became rector of St. John's Church, Elizabeth, N. J., and remained there until his death, Jan. 28, 1875, at the age of fifty-three years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

Clark, Samuel Wallace, a Congregational minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1796. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1823, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1827; was ordained Aug. 5, 1829; became pastor at Greenland, N. H., the same year, and died there, Aug. 17, 1847. See Trien. Cut. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 74.

Clark, Saul, a Congregational minister, was born at Southampton, Mass., in 1780. He graduated at Williams College in 1805; was pastor of the Church in East Haven, Conn., from 1808 to 1818; in Barkhamstead; in Chester, from 1829 to 1831; in Egremont, Mass., in 1834; and, after a few years, returned to his former home in East Haven, where he died in 1849. See Hampden Pulpit, p. 40. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Semira H., a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Indiana in 1825. Her ministerial work was performed chiefly within the limits of the Westfield Monthly Meeting, where she was highly esteemed. She afterwards engaged in a special work in which she was greatly interested, but died suddenly, near Westfield, Hamilton Co., Ind., Feb. 12, 1879. See Friends' Review, xxxiii, 490. (J. C. S.)

Clark, S. P., a Baptist minister, was born in Charlotte County, Va., March 5, 1801, and united with the Church in 1827. In 1832 he removed to Carroll County, Tenn. He began to preach in 1842, and his pastorates were New Hope, Eldad, Turkey Creek, Chapel Hill, and Boiling Springs. Having acquired a good estate, he preached almost gratuitously. In 1862 he removed to Milan, where he died, March 5, 1880. See Borum, Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, p. 148, 149. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Theodosius, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at New Rochelle, N. Y., in 1786. He was converted in 1805; removed to New York city, and in 1812 entered the New York Conference, in which he labored faithfully until 1837, when he took a superannuated relation, and thus continued till his death, July 28, 1872. Mr. Clark was well read in theology, and a superior preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 46.

Clark, Thomas (1), a Scotch clergyman, was appointed to the living at Ardrossan in 1691, and ordained, and died Nov. 20, 1737. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 157.

Clark, Thomas (2), an Associate Reformed minister, graduated at the University of Glasgow. In 1745 and 1746 he did faithful service in the army. According to the practice of the day, he pursued a thorough course of medical study in the university. He met with the Associate Burgher Synod at Stirling, in 1747; and was ordained and installed over the congregation of Ballybay, Ireland, July 23, 1751. While preaching here he was taken prisoner for his views respecting the oath of allegiance, but converted the jail-keeper and was discharged. He came to America about 1765, and was the first Burgher minister in this country. He preached in Salem, Mass., for several years, then in the South, where he did much good; and finally in Abbeville, S. C., where he died, Dec. 25, 1793. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iv, 18.

Clark, Thomas (3), a Scotch clergyman, was presented to the living at Eaglesham in 1765, and ordained in 1767; but the settlement was delayed by a furious mob preventing the presbytery entering the church, and threatening death to the minister and patron. The General Assembly censured the presbytery for the delay. He was killed by a fall from his horse, Aug. 3, 1783. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 65.

Clark, Thomas (4), a Scotch clergyman, born at Galloway in September, 1790, was licensed to preach in 1819, presented to the living at Methven in 1824, and ordained; was transferred to the Old Church, Edinburgh, in 1841, and died Jan. 11, 1857, aged sixty-six years. He was a man of clear and vigorous intellect; his sermons were models of condensed thought and expression. For several years he managed the business of the General Assembly's Colonial Committee. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 652.

Clark, Thomas (5), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1832, presented by the king to the living at Lethendy in 1835, and after much objection ordained; the legal difficulties still continued, a libel was preferred against him for drunkenness, his license was taken from him in 1846, and he died at Glasgow in July, 1859, aged fifty-two years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 805, 806.

Clark, Thomas W., a Baptist minister, was born at New Canaan Settlement, Queens Co., N. B., Feb. 3, 1808. In 1830 he removed to Stark County, O., and in 1840 took up his residence in De Witt, Ia.; in 1843 began to preach, for a number of years performing itinerant and missionary work; and afterwards took charge of the Church in De Witt, which was organized by him in 1852. He devoted the latter years of his life to evangelistic work, and died at De Witt, May 10, 1883. See The Chicago Standard, June 14, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Clark, Timothy, a Congregational minister, was born in Connecticut in 1764. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1791, and was ordained pastor of the Church in Greenfield, N. H., Jan. 1, 1800, where he remained until May 1, 1811. He died in 1841. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 145.

Clark, Watson, a Baptist minister, was born at Yorkshire, N. Y., July 10, 1828. He became a Christian at fourteen, graduated from Madison University in 1850, and from the Rochester Seminary in 1852, and was ordained at Girard, Pa., Aug. 26, 1852. He went to Ohio, where he labored as pastor at Marietta, 1852-54; Ohio Court-house, 1854-56; Cincinnati, 1856-58; as an evangelist in Saline Association, Missouri, 1858-61; pastor a second time at Ohio Court-house, 1862-65; Mount Gilead, 1866-68; Goshen, Ind., 1870-72; Xenia, Ill., 1872-74; Winchester, 1874-76. His last pastorate was in Sycamore, De Kalb Co., where he died June 10, 1877. See Minutes of Illinois Anniversaries, 1877, p. 10. (J. C. S.)

Clark, William, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1692, appointed to the living at Twynholm in 1693 and ordained, and died before Feb. 3, 1725. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 726.

Clark, William Atwater, D.D., a Protestant Episcopal minister, brother of Dr. Orin Clark, was born at New Marlborough, Mass., July 20, 1786. For a time he taught school, and pursued both his classical and theological studies at the Episcopal Academy in Cheshire, Conn. In 1810 he received deacon's orders, and went to western New York as a missionary; was ordained priest Sept. 15, 1812, and preached at Auburn for nine months, then removed to Manlius, Onondaga Co., and there preached for several years; in 1818 went to Buffalo, and travelled extensively to collect funds for the building of St. Paul's Church in that city; July 17, 1820, became rector of Christ Church, Ballston Spa, and remained four years; removed to New York city in 1824, organized All-Saints' Church on May 27 of that year, and was made its first rector; in 1837 resigned the rectorship, and removed to Michigan with the intention of retiring from active work; but having settled in Brighton, opened his own house for public service, and in process of time a church was organized. He died there, Sept. 13, 1841. Dr. Clark published a number of sermons; the last, The Steward's Reckoning, a volume of eighteen discourses, was issued by request of the vestry of All-Saints' in 1833. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 536.

Clark, William Henry, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Cheshire, Conn., and graduated from the General Theological Seminary, N. Y. He was ordained deacon in 1845, and employed for several years as a teacher in Pittsburgh, Pa.; in 1857 was rector of St. Peter's Church in Rome, Ga., and in 1863 was chosen rector of St. Paul's, Augusta, in which position he remained until his sudden death, Aug. 10, 1877, at the age of fifty-eight years. In 1875 Mr. Clark declined the African missionary episcopate. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1878, p. 168.

Clarke, Alexander, an English minister of the Society of Friends, in the 17th century, was converted in early manhood, but, not satisfied with the churches which he frequented, united with the Quakers, and, after a time, began to preach. For forty years he labored diligently for his Master, and was instrumental in accomplishing great good. He died in the seventy-fifth year of his age. See Piety Promoted, ii, 126, 127. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Alured, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1696. He was educated at St. Paul's School, and Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he was made fellow in 1718. He was installed prebendary of Winchester on May 23, 1723; was chaplain to king George I and George II; was promoted to a prebend in the Church of Westminster on May 8, 1731; was made dean of Exeter on May 12, 1740, and died May 31, 1742. His printed works are few, consisting of only four occasional Sermons, and an Essay, published in 1738, on Queen Caroline. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clarke, Ambrose W., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, entered the ministry in 1862, and soon after became assistant minister of St. Luke's Church, Baltimore, Md. In 1865 he was warden of the Church Home and Infirmary in that city; the following year rector of St. John's Church, Aberdeen, Miss., and there remained until his death, Oct. 30, 1871. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1872, p. 127.

Clarke, Charles P., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was missionary for several years in Ottawa, Ill., and about 1857 became rector there. In 1859 he was made rector of St. John's Church, Lacon; in 1861 was appointed chaplain of the Eleventh Regiment Illinois Volunteers; the following year assumed the rectorship of St. George's Church, Utica, Ill., which he retained until 1865; and from that time resided without charge in Ottawa, where he died, Dec. 26, 1870. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1872, p. 127.

Clarke, David Duncan, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Shippenburg, Cumberland Co., Pa., in Oct., 1810. He graduated from Jefferson College, Cannonsburg, in 1831, and spent one year (1832-33) in Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed by Carlisle Presbytery in 1838, and was pastor at Schellsburg, Bedford Co., until 1843; at Lower Marsh Creek, Adams Co., until 1856, and at Waynesburg, Newton, and Hamilton, in Huntingdon Co., until his death, Dec. 30, 1865. He left a character without a stain, and a precious memory in every congregation he served. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1857, p. 127; Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 87.

Clarke, Edmund, an English Baptist minister, was born in the city of Worcester in 1797. After uniting with the Church under the pastoral care of the Rev. Abraham Austin, Fetter Lane, London, he pursued his preparatory studies for the ministry at Stepney College, and was ordained at Truro in 1819, where he remained a highly acceptable minister until 1831, when he resigned, and became pastor at Battersea as successor to the distinguished Rev. Joseph Hughes. Afterwards he returned to his former church at Truro. Being compelled, by ill-health, to retire from the active ministry, he endeavored to serve his Master in various ways until his death, July 8, 1839. He is spoken of as having been an esteemed brother and a valued fellow-laborer. See Report of the Baptist Union, 1840, p. 26. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Edward, an English clergyman, was born at Buxted, March 16, 1730. He took his degree at St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1752, and was elected a fellow in 1755. In 1758 he took charge of the rectory of Pepperharrow, in Surrey. His first publication was a copy of Greek hexameters on the death of Frederick, prince of Wales, in the Luctus Academiæ Cantabrigiensiæ (1751), and soon after he projected the improvement of a Latin Dictionary. He went to Minorca in 1763, and on his return, in 1768, was inducted to the vicarages of Willington and Arlington, in Sussex. In 1778 he issued proposals for an edition in folio of the Greek Testament, with a selection of notes from the most eminent critics and commentators, but sufficient encouragement was not given. He died in November, 1786. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clarke, Elam Calhoun, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts, graduated from Williams College in 1812, and spent a part of one year in Andover Theological Seminary. He was ordained April 13, 1824; was pastor at Richmond Street Church, Providence, R. I., in that and the following year; stated supply at various places from 1825 to 1831; principal of an academy at Greenwich, Conn., until 1835, and without charge at Suffield until his death there, Feb. 19, 1837. See Trien. Cat. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 31.

Clarke, George, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in the county of Durham in 1785. He was converted in manhood; commenced his ministry in 1813; labored for twenty-nine years, four (1835-38) being spent on the Shetland Islands; became a supernumerary at Stockton in 1842, and Gateshead in 1844; and died at Sunderland, July 19, 1857. He was zealous and successful. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1857.

Clarke, Hugh L. M., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, entered the ministry in 1859; was missionary in Zion Church, Belvidere, and St. James's Church, Knowlton, N. J., and rector of Zion Church, Rome, N. Y., until his death, Oct. 2, 1880. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1881, p. 172.

Clarke, Ivory, a Baptist missionary, was born at North Berwick, Me., and graduated from Waterville College in 1834, and from the Newton Theological Institution in 1837. He was appointed a missionary April 3, 1837, and sailed the latter part of that year for Africa. For seven years he resided at Bexley, Liberia, and for three years at Edina, engaged in preaching, looking after the interests of the mission schools, translating a part of the New Test., and making a dictionary of the Bassa language. In order to recruit his wasted energies he sailed for America April 6, 1848, but died at sea eight days afterwards. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, James M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Baltimore County, Md., Nov. 16, 1806. He was converted at eighteen, and educated at Dickinson College. He entered the Baltimore Conference in 1832, in which he served twenty-three charges, practicing medicine for several years in connection with his ministerial work, and died at Duncansville, Pa., March 12, 1880. He was a true man; a devoted, laborious, and successful preacher. See Minutes of the Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 96.

Clarke, James Stainer, an English clergyman and writer, was domestic chaplain and librarian to George IV, vicar of Preston, rector of Coombs, canon of Windsor, and died in 1834. He published several works on maritime voyages and kindred subjects, also The Life of James II, from the original MSS. (1816, 2 vols. 4to). See Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clarke, Jeremiah, an English composer of church music, was educated under Dr. Blow, of the Chapel Royal, appointed organist of St. Paul's Cathedral in 1693, and in 1704 one of the organists in the king's chapel. His compositions are few, on account of his untimely death in July, 1707. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clarke, John (1), a Sabbatarian, or Seventh-day Baptist, minister, was born at Westerly, R. I., in 1717. He was ordained a deacon in May, 1768. As a soldier he performed military duty in the colonial wars and in the revolution. In 1773 he became the successor of Rev. Thomas Hiscox, as pastor in Hopkinton; was for several years a member of the Rhode Island General Assembly, and was recognised as a man of marked ability. He died March 8, 1793. See R. I. Cyclop. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, John (2), D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Portsmouth, N. H., April 13, 1755, and graduated from Harvard College in 1774. He was ordained pastor of the First Church in Boston, as colleague of Rev. Dr. Chauncy, and for nine years the relation was sustained with mutual respect and affection. His connection with the Church as sole pastor continued until his sudden death, April 2, 1798. He was a faithful and learned minister of the gospel. He published a number of Discourses:—a work in answer to the question, "Why are you a Christian?"—Letters to a Student at College (12mo). A volume of his Sermons and Discourses to Young Persons appeared after his death. See Mass. Hist. Collection, vi, 1-9. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, John S., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was appointed missionary in 1870 to Christ Church, Chester, and to Pottersville, N. Y. In 1873 he became rector of Christ Church, Morristown, in the same state, and had charge of the mission in connection with that Church. In 1874 he removed to Ashland, and died April 13, 1875. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

Clarke, Josiah H., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was admitted into the Georgia Conference in his nineteenth year, and served the Bryan and Chatham Mission, Warren Circuit, Jefferson Mission, Sparta Circuit, Spring Place, and Lanier Circuit, where he died, May 29, 1854. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1854, p. 546.

Clarke, Lucius W., a Congregational minister, was born at Mansfield, Conn., in 1801, and graduated from Brown University in 1825. He was ordained at Wilbraham, Mass., Dec. 9, 1829; was dismissed Dec. 13, 1832, and died at Middlebury, Vt., Jan. 2, 1854. See Hampden Pulpit, p. 112. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Matthew, an English nonconformist minister (son of Rev. Matthew Clarke, who was ejected from the living of Harborough, Leicestershire, and who contrived amid all his sufferings for conscience' sake to give his son an excellent ministerial education), was born Feb. 2, 1663. He began his ministry at Little Bowden, near Market Harborough, in 1684; in 1687 accepted a call to Sandwich, Kent; two years later returned to his flock in Leicestershire, and shortly afterwards went to Miles's Lane, London, as assistant. In 1694 he became sole pastor, and soon changed a declining Church to the most prosperous in London. About that time he was chosen one of the lecturers at Pinner's Hall. He continued his pastorate with unsparing labor of body and mind till his death, March 27, 1726. Mr. Clarke had a commanding person and a melodious voice; was eminently amiable and accomplished, and highly successful in the pulpit, notwithstanding a certain degree of timidity. See Bogue and Bennett, History of Dissenters, 2d ed. ii, 351; Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i, 474, 491.

Clarke, Miner G., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Woodstock, Conn., Dec. 9, 1809, and was descended from the same family stock as the Rev. John Clarke, so distinguished in the annals of the early Baptist history of Newport, R. I. He was converted in youth, graduated from the Newton Theological Institution in 1837, and was ordained at Suffield, Conn., shortly after. He was compelled by ill-health to resign his charge, but having somewhat recovered, was invited to the pastorate of the Church in Grafton, Mass. After a year and a half of great prosperity he was again obliged to resign. His next settlement was in Norwich, Conn., where, during his six years' ministry, he built up a strong, efficient church. He was now called to Springfield, Mass., where he was equally successful. Once more his health gave way, and for a time he supplied the pulpit of the First Baptist Church in Williamsburg, N. Y., and acted as financial secretary of the American and Foreign Bible Society. In 1851 he became pastor of the Tabernacle Church in Philadelphia, and had an experience similar to that which had attended his previous pastorates. In 1856 he went to Indianapolis, and there established, and for six years edited, the Witness, a denominational paper. At the end of this period he removed to Chicago, where, as financial secretary, he performed valuable service for the university in that city. Subsequently he was for a short time pastor at Evanston, near Chicago, and for four years financial secretary of the Home Mission Society at New York. He died near Geneva, Ill., Sept. 19, 1881. See Chicago Standard, Sept. 29, 1881; Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Moses, a Congregational minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1792; graduated from Harvard College in 1819, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1822. He was ordained Nov. 22, of the same year, went as a home missionary to Louisiana, and died there in 1823. See Trien. Cut. of Andover Theol. Sem. 1870, p. 50.

Clarke, Orlando, a Presbyterian, and afterwards Congregational, minister, was born Nov. 6, 1824, at Geneva, Ind., and was licensed by the Presbytery of Indianapolis. He took a partial course of study at Hanover College; graduated at Bloomington in 1844; from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1851, and afterwards spent a year at Yale as a resident licentiate. From 1854 to 1856 he was stated supply at Edinburg; in 1857 at Greenville, and in 1858 at Troy. About 1859 he became connected with the Congregational denomination, in which he ever after remained, at first preaching to several churches at Bentonport, Des Moines, and elsewhere in Iowa, for short periods of time. In 1862 or 1863 he took charge of the Iowa College for the Blind, and was instrumental in its removal to Vinton, having charge of the erection of its original buildings. In 1864 he returned to the regular work of the ministry, was ordained as an evangelist Jan. 5, 1865, at St. Louis, Mo., and was stated supply at St. Anthony, Minn., in 1866 and 1867. In the latter year he removed to Lansing, Ia., where he resided, although preaching at various places, until June, 1875, when he returned to Vinton, and again took charge of the Iowa College for the Blind, as its superintendent. In this position he remained to the end of his life, April 2, 1876, giving full satisfaction to the trustees, the community, and the state authorities, largely promoting the prosperity of the institution, and greatly endeared to all the pupils and assistants. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1877, p. 41; Cong. Quarterly, xix, 413.

Clarke, Owen, an English Baptist minister, was born Dec. 3, 1791. He became a Christian in early life, and at sixteen or seventeen went out as an itinerant preacher. In 1812 he entered the Bank of England, and shortly afterwards became pastor of the Church meeting at Paradise Chapel, Chelsea, occupying both positions until 1824, when, his health failing, the directors granted him a pension for life. Subsequently he was pastor of a church in Taunton, and afterwards of two churches, at different dates, in Bath. In 1841 he became travelling agent of the British and Foreign Temperance Society, and in 1842 pastor of the Elini Chapel, Fetter Lane, London. In 1856 he resigned, but finally ministered to the Working-men's Church, Kensington, without salary, till his death, Jan. 15, 1859. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1859, p. 46, 47. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Peter G., a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Woodbury, Conn., Feb. 11, 1793. Having received his classical and theological training under Dr. Tillotson Brownson, he was made honorary A.M. in 1821 by Yale College. He was ordained deacon in 1818, presbyter in 1820, and began his ministry in Norwich as assistant to Rev. John Tyler, and missionary to several places in the neighborhood. In 1838 he was commissioned chaplain in the United States navy, in which position he continued till his death at Cheshire, Conn., Jan. 1, 1860. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1860, p. 180.

Clarke, Richard, an English clergyman, was ordained deacon by the bishop of Winchester, May 5, 1746, and presbyter by the bishop of Bangor, Sept. 23, 1750, and was sent to South Carolina by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, arriving at Charleston in the autumn of 1753. St. Philip's Church in that city being without a pastor, he and the Rev. John Andrews became co-pastors in the parish. The negro school within its jurisdiction became the object of his earnest efforts. In 1759 he resigned his rectorship, returned to England, and in a short time after was appointed lecturer of Stoke-Newington, and afterwards of St. James's, near Aldgate, London. In 1768 he was curate of Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire. Pecuniary embarrassment troubled his last years. He died not earlier than 1780. As a preacher he was greatly admired. Among his publications are, A Warning to the World, or the Prophetic Numbers of Daniel and John Calculated (1759);—A Second Warning (1762);—The Voice of Glad Tidings to the Jew and Gentile (1768);—The Gospel of the Daily Service of the Law Preached to the Jew and Gentile (1768);—An Essay on the Number Seven, treating of the Romish and Mohammedan religions, etc. (1769);—The Explanation of the Feast of Trumpets. Besides these he published letters, essays, dissertations, and discourses on various subjects. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 146.

Clarke, Richard Perry, an English Congregational minister, was born at Barnstaple, North Devon, July 17, 1821. He connected himself with the Church in early life; received his ministerial preparation at Western College, Exeter, and began his ministry in 1848 as pastor of Lower Darwen, Lancashire. He removed to Uxbridge in 1860; to City-road, London, in 1867; in 1868 to Bristol, and died June 21, 1878. Mr. Clarke's preaching was simple, direct, earnest, and evangelical, and his life was in thorough harmony with his teaching. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 306.

Clarke, Richard Samuel, an Episcopal clergyman, was born in 1737, and for nineteen years was minister at New Milford, Conn., from which place he removed to Gagetown, N. B., and was rector there twenty-five years. His last settlement was in St. Stephen, where his ministry continued thirteen years. He died there, Oct., 1824. See Sabine, Loyalists of the Amer. Rev. i, 316. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Robert, an English Congregational minister, was born at Nailsworth, Gloucestershire, in 1796, of Quaker parents. He united with the Baptists in youth, prepared for the ministry at Bristol College, and in 1818 became pastor of the Baptist Church at Lechlade. He subsequently preached twelve years at Bridgenorth, eight years at Oswestry, and five years at Kingsbridge, Devonshire. He then joined the Congregationalists, and became pastor at Shaldon. After laboring at Shaldon six years, he lived in retirement in the vicinity of Romford, Essex, six or seven years; and finally, in 1863, went to labor in the village of Aveley, where he died, Feb. 14, 1878. Mr. Clarke was a very excellent preacher, and in the pulpit, as elsewhere, direct and courageous in expressing his convictions. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 306.

Clarke, Roger, an English martyr, was apprehended at Ipswich in 1546, and taken before a priest, who questioned him as to the real presence in the eucharist. He was threatened by the priest, but, continuing constant, was burned at Bury in 1546. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, v, 530.

Clarke, Samuel (1), a celebrated English Orientalist, probably born in Northamptonshire in 1623, was educated at Merton College, Oxford, where he took his degree of A.M. in 1648. In 1650 and 1658 he was master of a boarding-school at Islington, near London, during his stay at which place he assisted in correcting and publishing Walton's Polyglot Bible. He died at Holywell, Oxford, Dec. 27, 1669. Among his works are, Varia Lectiones et Observationes in Chaldaicum Paraphrasim (in the above Polyglot, vi, 17);—Scientia Metrica et Rhythmica (Oxon. 1661, 8vo). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clarke, Samuel (2), an English divine, was born about 1626, and educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. He early applied himself to the study of the Scriptures, and died Feb. 24, 1701. His Annotations on the Bible (1690, fol.), printed together with the sacred text, was the great work of his life. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clarke, Tertius Strong, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Westhampton, Mass., Dec. 17, 1798. He graduated from Yale College in 1824, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1827, in which year he was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in South Deerfield, Mass. He retired in 1833, and was installed at Haddam, Conn., the next year; in 1837 became pastor at Stockbridge, Mass.; in 1850 acting pastor at Penn Yan, N. Y.; in 1852 pastor at Franklin; in June, 1858, at Cuyahoga Falls, O., from which he was dismissed in 1862; Jan. 1, 1863, accepted the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church at Weedsport, N. Y.; removed to Cuyahoga Falls in 1866, without charge; and died in Neath, Pa., April 12, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 422.

Clarke, Thomas W., a Baptist minister, was born in Brewster, Mass., Feb. 28, 1820. He was converted in early life, pursued his preparatory studies at the Leicester Academy, and at the Theological Seminary, Bangor, Me., where he graduated when about twenty-one years of age. He was ordained pastor in Nantucket, Mass., in 1851, and served ten or eleven years there, and at Wheatland, N. Y., and Lexington, Mass.; also for several months supplying the pulpit at West Harwich. He received an appointment in the beginning of the late civil war as chaplain in the army, and was severely wounded near New Berne, N. C. After his recovery from an amputation, president Lincoln reappointed him permanent chaplain, and he was stationed, first at a military hospital in Montpelier, Vt., and subsequently at a similar institution in Worcester, Mass. When this latter hospital was abandoned, he was appointed to an inspectorship in the custom-house in Boston. While occupying this position, and for several years after he left it, he preached very acceptably whenever he had an opportunity. He died at Boston Highlands, Feb. 11, 1881. Mr. Clarke was a man of good abilities, genial in spirit, an ardent patriot, and devoted to the work to which he had consecrated his life. See The Watchman, March 17, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, Walter, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Westfield Parish, Middletown, Conn., April 5, 1812. His early life was spent in Farmington, with-or his parents had removed. He graduated from Yale College in 1837, and was soon after elected professor of Greek in the College of Mobile, where he spent two years, and then accepted the presidency of that college. Resuming his theological studies, he graduated from Yale Divinity School in 1841: was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Canterbury, Conn., the same year; and in 1845 became pastor of the Second Congregational Church, Hartford. He regarded his pastorate in Hartford as the most fruitful and delightful period of his life. On account of his health, he accepted a call to the Mercer Street Presbyterian Church in New York city in 1859, and after two years became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Buffalo, a position which he filled with great success until the close of his life, May 23, 1871. (W. P. S.)

Clarke, Wesley C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Bloomfield, Monroe Co., O. He embraced religion in early life, and in 1834 entered the Ohio Conference. In 1849 he became a superannuate, and died Sept. 2, 1855. Mr. Clarke was energetic beyond his physical endurance. He was a confiding friend, an ardent Christian, an able and successful minister, and an eminently faithful pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1855, p. 634.

Clarke, William (1), a learned English divine and antiquary, was born at Haghmon Abbey, Shropshire, in 1696. He was educated at Shrewsbury School, and St. John's College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow on Jan. 22, 1717. In 1724 he was presented to the rectory of Buxted, in Sussex, by archbishop Wake, and was made prebendary in the cathedral church of Chichester. He resigned the rectory of Buxted in 1768, and in June, 1770, was installed chancellor of the Church of Chichester. He died Oct. 21, 1771. He assisted in the translation of Frapp's Lectures on Poetry and in Annotations on the Greek Testament, and was the author of several of the notes subjoined to the English version of Bletierie's Life of the Emperor Julian. His chief work was the Connection of the Roman, Saxon, and English Coins (1767, 4to). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clarke, William (2), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1744, called to the living at Kirkgunzeon in 1746, ordained in 1747, and died Nov. 23, 1786, aged seventy-four years. A lame foot marred his personal appearance, but his exemplary life and warmth of benevolence secured him respect. See Fasts Eccles. Scotticæ, i, 586.

Clarke, William (3), an Episcopal minister, son of Rev. Peter Clarke, was born in Danvers, Mass., about 1739. He graduated at Harvard College in 1759, went to England and was ordained, then returned to America, and became rector of St. Paul's Church in Dedham, Mass. Here he was successful in his ministry, and lived in peace until the spring of 1777, when he was sentenced to be confined on board a ship because he refused to acknowledge the independence of the United States. After his release he went to England. In 1786 he resided in Halifax, N. S., and soon afterwards removed to Digby. Subsequently he returned to the United States, and died in Quincy, Mass., in 1815. See Sabine, Loyalists of the Amer. Rev. i, 315. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, William (4), an English Baptist minister, was born in Kenton, Suffolk, April 7, 1779. He was baptized Oct. 27, 1799; chosen a deacon of the Church Aug. 26, 1810, and ordained July 14, 1816. For many years he was pastor at Saxlingham, Norfolk. In 1858 he became pastor at Carleton Rode, where he remained until his death, Dec. 30, 1864. He was a truly godly man, liberal in heart, earnest and frequent in prayer, a lover of the house and ordinances of God. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1866, p. 127. (J. C. S.)

Clarke, William (5), an English Methodist preacher, was born at Harricott, Tavistock, Devon, Feb. 14, 1822. He was converted in his youth, joined the Bible Christians, was a class-leader and local preacher, entered the ministry in 1847, was an impressive, earnest preacher for thirty years, winning many souls to Christ, and became superannuated in 1877, but labored as he had strength till his death, Jan. 9, 1879. See Minutes of the 61st Annual Conference.

Clarke, William Henry, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Norwich, Conn., Jan. 22, 1821. He entered college in the sophomore year from the Episcopal Academy, Cheshire, and, on graduating, proceeded to study in the General Theological Seminary, N. Y., completing his course in 1845, when he was ordained deacon, June 29. He spent several years engaged in teaching in the Patapsco Female Institute, Ellicott's Mills, Md., being ordained presbyter Sept. 20, 1846. In 1852 and 1853 he served as an agent of the Church Book Society of New York; and from September, 1853, till February, 1856, had charge of Locust Grove Seminary, near Pittsburgh, Pa. In March, 1856, he became rector of St. Peter's Church, Rome, Ga., and left that position in the summer of 1861 to remove to Augusta as assistant rector of St. Paul's Church. In January, 1863, he became rector, and so continued till his death, Aug. 10, 1877. From 1863 he was a member of the standing committee of the diocese, and from 1867 its president. In October, 1875, he was selected by the House of Bishops to be missionary bishop to Cape Palmas, Africa, which office he declined. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1878.

Clarke, William Nash, an English Baptist minister, was born in London, April 21, 1732. He was converted under George Whitefield, but joined the Baptists at Devonshire Square, London. He studied under Dr. S. Steinnett; became pastor at Unicorn-Yard in 1761; educated several young men for the ministry; removed to Exeter in 1786, and died there, July 29, 1795. Mr. Clarke was a man of great piety and probity, and preached against the spread of Antinomianism. He published four Sermons and Charges. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 239.

Clarke, W., an English Congregational minister, was born in Coventry, Dec. 22, 1801. He joined the Church in youth, prepared for the ministry at Hackney Academy, and began his vocation at Godalming, Surrey. In 1837, at the instance of the Colonial Missionary Society, he settled in Ontario, Canada, where he held successive pastorates at London, Simcoe, and Dresden, and died in 1878. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 308.

Clarke, W. Augustus, an English Baptist minister, was ordained by a Greek bishop, but joined the Baptists, and in 1773 became pastor at Red-cross Street. In 1780 he was opposed by the papists, and had to remove to a room in Bunhill Row. He then fled to Ireland, next to America; but returned to London in 1797, and in 1799 resumed preaching in Bunhill Row, where he still was in 1801. See Gadsby, Hymn-writers, p. 39; Wilson, Dissenting Churches, iv, 431.

Clarkson, Abraham, an English Independent minister, was born at Earlsheaton, Dewsbury, in 1783. He was carefully trained in the Established Church; was converted at the age of twenty, and became a member of the Independent Church at Ossett in 1806. In April, 1811, he was admitted to the academy at Idle; the same year became pastor at Mixenden, Halifax; in 1818 removed to Bingley, near Bradford; in 1837, went to reside at Batley, near Dewsbury, where, through his efforts, a commodious place of worship was built in 1839, and in which, as contributor, a frequent supply, and as deacon, he rendered efficient service till his death, May 4, 1850. Mr. Clarkson was a man of deep and uniform piety, and eminently diligent in the discharge of all his duties. See The Evangelical Magazine (Lond.), 1850, p. 705.

Clarkson, David (1), B.D., a celebrated English nonconformist divine, and one of the tutors of archbishop Tillotson, was born at Bradford, Yorkshire, Feb. 2, 1622, and educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, of which he was made a fellow. He was minister of the Mortlake Church, Surrey, till ejected in 1662, after which he preached in obscure places till 1682, when he was chosen co-pastor with Dr. Owen at Mortlake, whom he succeeded in 1683. He died June 14, 1686. His publications include Primitive Episcopacy (Lond. 1680):—No Evidence of Diocesan Episcopacy in Primitive Times (1681); a work in answer to Stillingfleet:—Discourse of Liturgies (1689):—Sermons and Discourses (1696); and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i, 285.

Clarkson, David (2), a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in Worcestershire, England, in June, 1801. He graduated at Oxford University; came to America in 1823; was ordained by bishop Doane, and became rector of Trinity Parish, Belvidere, N. J., officiating also in several neighboring places. From 1852 to 1855 he was chaplain in the United States Army, and was stationed at Fort Riley, Kansas. In the winter of 1855 he was pastor at Lexington, Mo., and in 1860 he removed to Grand Rapids, Mich., where he died, April 6, 1862. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1862, p. 735.

Clarkson, James, an Associate minister, was born, educated, and licensed in Scotland. In 1772 he was sent to America by the General Associate Synod of Scotland; was ordained and settled as pastor of the Associate Reformed Church in Guinston, York Co., Pa., and died in 1811. Mr. Clarkson took an active part in discussions which terminated in the formation of the Associate Reformed Church, by the union of the Associate and Reformed Presbyterian bodies in 1782, and distinguished himself particularly by being one of the two ministers who finally held out against the union. He was moderator of the Associate Synod in 1800. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 15.

Clarkson, Joseph, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in 1765. During the early part of the Revolution he attended a classical school in Lancaster, Pa., of which Dr. Robert Smith, a Presbyterian clergyman, was principal. In 1782 he graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, and, after studying theology, was ordained deacon in 1787, in which year he acted as secretary to the House of Bishops. He began his ministry in Philadelphia, but soon after went to Wilmington, Del., and ministered until 1799 in the old Swedes' Church. In April of that year he became rector of St. James's Church, Lancaster, his field of labor embracing two country parishes besides St. James's, and here he died, Jan. 25, 1830. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 282.

Clarkson, Thomas B., an Associate minister, was born in 1794; finished his theological course in 1819, and was licensed the year after. He was ordained Aug. 13, 1822; was pastor at Mercersburg and McConnellsburg from 1823 to 1833; then resigned on account of ill-health, and died in 1836. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 16.

Clarkson, William Henry, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at York. He was brought up in the Established Church, but converted among the Methodists. He began his ministry at Rye, where his labors were signally blessed, and during a long course in the travelling ministry the same success attended him. He was for many years a superannuate at Canterbury, where he died, Dec. 28, 1881, aged eighty-six years. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1882, p. 19.

Clarus is the name of several eminent persons in early Christian history:

1. Bishop of Ptolemais, attended the synod of Caesarea, A.D. 198, convened by the metropolitan Theophilus and Narcissus of Jerusalem, with the view of settling the paschal controversy (Eusebius, H. E. v, 25).

2. Bishop of Mascula, in Numidia.

3. Apostle of Aquitaine, a martyr, and, as some writers say, a bishop who came from Africa to Rome and was sent thence by pope Anaclethus, in the 1st century, as a missionary to Aquitaine. He was martyred at Lectoure, in Gascony, and buried in the same place. He is commemorated June 1.

4. A presbyter and martyr, commemorated Nov. 4 in Usuard's Martyrology.

5. First bishop of Alby, and martyr, flourished in the 3d century; commemorated at Alby on July 1.

6. Bishop of Nantes, apostle of Brittany in the latter part of the 3d century. He was the first missionary sent into Brittany, and first bishop of Nantes. There are various traditions respecting St. Clarus, that he associated with the apostles, or at least with two of them, Peter and Paul; that he was sent into Gaul by St. Peter, when that apostle was bishop of Rome; that he was sent into Gaul by St. Linus, the successor of St. Peter; that he brought with him the nail which fastened the right hand of Peter to the cross, etc. It appears that he went from Rome into Gaul with the deacon Adeodatus about 280, and preached in the southern district of Brittany. According to an ancient tradition, he died in the diocese of Vannes. His relics were transported in 878 to the abbey of St. Aubin of Angers. He is commemorated Oct. 10.

7. A presbyter of Touraine, born at Auvergne in the middle of the 4th century; commemorated Nov. 8.

8. A saint of Loudun, where he is honored as a martyr. He flourished probably in the 4th century, and is commemorated Aug. 8.

9. Presbyter and abbot of Vienne, in France, was born in the beginning of the reign of Clotaire II, in that town, on the banks of the Rhone. He was abbot of the monastery of St. Marcellus of Vienne, which he governed over twenty years, and had at the same time the direction of the convent of St. Blandina, to which his mother had retired. Having been informed of the hour of his death by an apparition of St. Blandina, he caused himself to be carried into the church, where he lay extended on a hair-cloth, and ceased not to pray and sing praises to God until he breathed his last. He died about the year 600. His life has been written anonymously and published by Mabillon and Bollandus. He was buried in the Church of St. Blandina. His bones were scattered in the 16th century by the Huguenots. He is commemorated Jan. 1.

10. A priest and martyr, was a native of Rochester, and died about 894. He went to Gaul and established himself in Le Vexin, where he soon acquired a high reputation. A beautiful woman, who did not succeed in making him comply with her passion, revenged herself by paying two criminals to assassinate him, in a borough which still bears his name, Saint-Clar, and which is famous for the treaty that ceded to Rollo the province of Neustria.

Clary, Dexter, a Congregational minister, was born in Conway, Mass., Feb. 1, 1798. For a while he was a merchant in Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., and then entered upon a course of study with a view to the ministry, receiving license to preach in 1828. Under commission of the Western Domestic Missionary Society he labored a year in western New York. In 1829 he was ordained an evangelist at Watertown, in the Presbyterian Church, and for several years served as such in the region about Rochester, Buffalo, and occasionally in Canada. For the purpose of studying theology he went to New Haven, Conn., in 1834. Not long after he was called to Montreal, where he labored for two years. In 1838 he went to Rockford, Ill., and in 1840 fixed his residence at Beloit, Wis. For a year after, his labors were divided between Congregational churches of these two places. The Church in Beloit having grown, he gave himself wholly to the work in that field. In September, 1850, he resigned his charge and entered the service of the American Home Missionary Society, as its superintendent for Wisconsin, an office which he filled for twenty-two years, travelling in that time about one hundred thousand miles. In the first years of his pastorate at Beloit were begun the consultations that resulted in the founding of Beloit College, of which, at its organization, he was elected one of the trustees; and at their first meeting, in 1845, he was appointed secretary of the board and of the executive committee—positions which he occupied until his death, June 18, 1874. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 357.

Clary, Joseph Ward, a Congregational minister, was born in New York. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1808, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1811; was ordained May 7, 1812, pastor of First Church, Dover, N. H.; was pastor at Cornish, from 1828 to 1834; and without charge at Cornish till his death, April 13, 1835. See Trien. Cut. of Andover Theol. Sem., 1870, p. 19.

Clasens, D., a Dutch engraver, who flourished about 1660, etched a number of plates, among which is one of The Virgin and Infant, with St. John and an Angel.

Clason, James (1), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister of Dalziel, was licensed to preach in 1808, and presented to the living at Dalziel the same year; he joined the Free Secession in 1843, and died suddenly April 16, 1852, aged sixty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 283.

Clason, James (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1831; was presented to the living at Ratho in 1833, and died April 17, 1842, aged thirty-four years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 141.

Clason, Patrick, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was born at Dalziel; licensed to preach in 1813; presented to the living at Carmunnock in 1814; ordained in 1815; resigned in 1821; transferred to St. Cuthbert's Chapel-of-Ease, Edinburgh, in 1824; and joined the Free Secession in 1843. At the first meeting of the Free General Assembly he was chosen joint-clerk, and moderator of the Free Assembly in 1848. He published, Considerations on the Erection of St. Cuthbert's Chapel-of-Ease (1833);—Strictures on the Statement of the Central Board of Scottish Dissenters; Two Letters (Edinburgh, 1835);—Speech in the Presbytery of Edinburgh in 1839; and three single Sermons. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 128; ii, 59.

Clason, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, native of Logie, was licensed to preach in 1774; presented to the living at Dalziel in 1786; elected clerk to the synod, but resigned on being transferred to Logie, Stirling, in 1801. He died July 8, 1831, aged eighty-five years, leaving two sons, James, minister at Dalziel, and Patrick, minister at Edinburgh. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 283, 737.

Classens, August, a Hungarian theologian, who was born at Galgop, and died at Pricwitz in 1750, wrote Eucharisticum Michaelis Caroli (1745, fol.):—Ecluyæ:—Elegiæ (in MS.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Classis (a class, division), the name of an ecclesiastical body in the Reformed (Dutch) Church in Holland and in America, corresponding to the presbytery in the Presbyterian Church. A classis is composed of the ministers or ministers, and one elder, of each church constituting the body, together with such other ministers without pastoral charge as may belong to it. The same arrangement prevails in the German Reformed Church in the United States.

The classis hold an intermediate place between the consistory and the particular synod. It is represented by two ministers and two elders in the particular synod, and by three ministers and three elders in the general synod. It is both a legislative and a judicial body, many of whose acts are subject to the revision of the superior courts. See REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA; GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA. (W. J. K. T.)

Claude, an ingenious French painter on glass, was born about 1468, and practiced at Marseilles, where he enjoyed a high reputation. He was invited to Rome by the great architect Bramante to paint the windows of the Vatican; and also executed the large windows of Santa Maria del Popolo. He died there not long afterwards. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Claude, Saint, OF BESANÇON. See CLAUDIUS.

Claude (D'ABBEVILLE), Clément Foulton (generally known under the name of le Père), a French missionary and historian, of the Capuchin order, was one of the four who went, in 1612, with Razilly, lieutenant-general of the king, to found an institution in Brazil. After his mission had been accomplished, he went back to France to get help, but his age did not allow him to return to Brazil. He died at Paris in 1632, after having founded the convent of the Capuchins at Abbeville. He left Histoire de la Mission à l'île de Maragnon, etc. (Paris, 1614, 12mo):—Histoire de Collette, Vierge de l'Ordre de Sainte-Claire (ibid. 1619). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Claude, Isaac, a French Protestant theologian, son of Jean Claude, was born at Saint-Affrique, March 15, 1653. He first exercised his ministry at Sedan, and afterwards took charge of the Walloon Church at the Hague, where he died, July 29, 1695. He published the works of his father Jean. He is believed to be the author of Le Comte de Soissons, a romance (Cologne, 1677). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Claude, Jean Jacques, a French Protestant theologian, son of the preceding, was born at the Hague, Jan. 16, 1684, became pastor of a French church in London in 1710, and died there Feb. 27, 1712, leaving Sermons sur l'Écriture Sainte (Geneva, 1724, posthumously edited):—and some Dissertations (Utrecht, 1702, 12mo). See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Claudia was a sister of Sulpicius Severus, who was a disciple of St. Martin and presbyter in Aquitaine, and flourished about A.D. 420. A great number of letters were written to her by her brother, all bearing on the religious life. Two of them remain (see Gennadius, De Script. Eccles. xix; Itazue, Miscell. (Paris, 1678), i, 32; Ceillier, Auteurs, viii, 119).

Claudian, Saint, a citizen of Corinth, martyred under Sabinus, in Diospolis, Egypt, A.D. 284. See VICTORIS.

Claudianists were a sect of Donatists. It was one of the charges against the Donatist bishop Primianus that he murdered in the basilica those of his presbyters who objected to his admitting Claudianists to communion (Migne, Patrol. iv, 379).

Claudianus is the name of several persons in early Christian records:

1. Martyr with Papias and Diodorus in the Decian persecution, is commemorated Feb. 25 in Usuard's and the old Roman martyrologies.

2. A martyr at Nicomedia, is commemorated March 6 in Usuard's martyrology.

3. A presbyter of Rome among the representatives of Sylvester at Arles, A.D. 314 (Labbé, Concil. i, 1429).

4. The reputed author of seven epigrams in the Greek anthology, two of which, ascribed to him in the Vatican MS., are addressed to the Saviour.

Claudius is the name of numerous men in early Christian history:

1. A person enumerated by Epiphanius (Haer. 51, 427) in a list of heretics who, like the Cerinthians and Ebionites, asserted that our Lord was a mere man.

2. A monk mentioned as a companion of Epiphanius, in the life by Simeon Metaphrastes (ii, 324).

3. A martyr at Ostia under Diocletian, commemorated Feb. 18 in Usuard's martyrology.

4. A martyr at Rome, with pope Marcellinus, April 26, A.D. 304, according to Usuard.

5. A martyr with Asterius and Neon, his brothers, at Aegia in Cilicia, under a judge named Lysias, about A.D. 303. The Latins commemorate them Aug. 23, the Greeks, Oct. 29 (see Fleury, Hist. Eccles. viii, 16).

6. Bishop of Picenum, at Rimini, A.D. 359.

7. A martyr at Rome with Nicostratus and others, commemorated July 7 in Usuard's martyrology.

8. Another martyr at Rome with Nicostratus and others, commemorated Nov. 8. Compare No. 7.

9. The tribune, martyr at Rome under Numinian, commemorated Dec. 3 in Usuard's and Roman martyrologies, but Aug. 12 in that of Jerome.

10. Saint, bishop of Vienne, lived in the 4th century, and is commemorated June 1. He was present at the Council of Nice, where he was prominent in the debate concerning the Donatists.

11. A bishop who sent Augustine the books that Julian, the Pelagian, had written against him, and to whom, in A.D. 421, Augustine dictates and sends his answer (Epist. 207), formerly prefixed to the books against Julian.

12. Saint Claudius I was the nineteenth bishop of Besançon (Vesuntium). The lists of the old chronologists make no mention of him; but in the year 517 he subscribed to the Council of Epaunum, signing himself "Episcopus ecclesiae Vesuntionensis."

13. Saint Claudius II was twenty-ninth bishop of Besançon, and succeeded (according to the lists) St. Gervasius. The incidents of his life are very legendary, but it seems probable that from his earliest years he was enrolled among the clergy of Besançon; that after a novitiate in the abbey of Mt. Jura he was elected to succeed abbot Injuriosus, A.D. 641 or 642, under the pontificate of pope John IV; that on the death of Gervasius he was elected by the clergy of Besançon to be their archbishop; that after seven years he abdicated and returned to rule the abbey of Mt. Jura; and that he died in A.D. 696 or 699. St. Claudius, in his lifetime the oracle and model of the clergy of Besançon, became after his death one of the most popular saints of France. He is mentioned in the 9th century by Rabanus Maurus in his Martyrologium, as an intercessor. He is commemorated June 6 (Gall. Christ. xv, 17; Migne, Encycl. Theol. xi; Patrol. Lat. cx, 1149).

14. Father of St. Fulgentius. The grandfather, Gordianus, was one of the senators driven from Carthage by Genseric, king of the Goths. Claudius and his brother returned to Africa, but found that their houses had been given to the Arian priests. After obtaining possession of their goods, by the king's authority, they passed into Byzacene, and established themselves at Telepte. Claudius married Maria Anna, a Christian lady, and Fulgentius was born A.D. 468. Claudius died soon after.

15. Second bishop of Glandèves, succeeded Fraternus, and was succeeded by Basilus. He is only known from having subscribed, through his representative, Benenatus, to the fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541 (Gall. Christ. iii, 1236).

16. A letter addressed to Claudius exists in the collection of the writings of Isidore, bishop of Seville (A.D. 599-636). From internal evidences, it is believed not to have been written by Isidore. This letter shows that the Greeks of the time believed Athanasius to be the author of the creed which bears his name. But the uncertainty of the date deprives this evidence of value (Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxxxiii).

17. Bishop of Taurinium (Turin), advanced to the see before A.D. 774, and succeeded by the celebrated Claudius Clemens.

18. Said to have been bishop of Auxerre (Dempster, Menol. Scot., commemorated March 20 and March 30), but not mentioned among the bishops of that see in Gall. Christ. (xii, 260), nor in Gams (Series Episc.).

19. Claudius Clemens, or Claudius Clemens Scotus. See CLEMENS (2).

20. A martyr whose relics were translated to Rome in 1650, together with those of St. Pontianus, and again translated to Antwerp in 1656. Commemorated May 14.

Claudius APOLLINARIS. See APOLLINARIS.

Claudius, GOTTFRIED CHRISTOPH, a German theologian, was the son of a minister, and was himself minister at Pratau and at Gieshübel. He died March 19, 1747. His principal works are, Historia Fratrum Sportulanium (Frankfort, 1724, 8vo):—Animadversiones ad Dissertationes Tremoniae, etc. (1733, 4to):—Commentatio de Chameunia (Wittenberg, 1738). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clausel (DE MONTAIS), Claude Hippolyte, a French prelate, brother of the following, was born April 5, 1769, at Rouergue (Aveyron). He studied at St. Sulpice, and after undergoing many vicissitudes during the revolution and the restoration, was in 1819 appointed almoner to the duchess of Angoulême, and in the year following preached the funeral sermon of the duke of Berry. In 1824 he was promoted to the bishopric of Chartres, which he resigned in 1851. He died in 1857. He was an enthusiastic defender of Gallicanism. Of his works we mention, Le Concordat Justifié (Paris, 1818):—Coup d'Œil sur l'Église de France:—La Religion Prouvée par la Révolution, etc. See Lichtenberger, Encyclop. des Sciences Religieuses, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Clausel (DE COUSSENGUES), Michel Amant, a French ecclesiastical writer, was born Oct. 7, 1763, at the Castle of Coussengues, in Rouergue (Aveyron), and was ordained a priest in 1787. He refused the oath to the civil constitution of the clergy in 1792, but accepted the concordat in 1802. He was appointed grand-vicar of Amiens, and took charge of the department of the Oise, at Beauvais. In 1822 he was called to the royal council of public instruction. At the time of the death of Leo XII he happened to be at Rome, and the cardinal of Clermont-Tonnerre appointed him to the conclave. After the revolution of 1830 he lived in retirement with the bishop of Versailles, and died at Paris, Jan. 22, 1835. Abbé Clausel published, among other works, Réflexions et Lettres sur l'Affaire du Curé de Chartres (1824):—Observations sur le Nouveau Catéchisme de Beauvais (1828). See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Clausen, Hendrik Georg, a celebrated Danish preacher, was born at Sleswick in 1759. After having been a country curate for several years, he was appointed, in 1797, pastor at the church of Notre-Dame at Copenhagen, and for nearly half a century delivered eloquent but rationalistic sermons, of which many have been published in two collections, entitled, Prædikener (1795 and 1807). He died in 1840. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clausen, Hendrik Nikolai, a Danish theologian, brother of the foregoing, was born April 22, 1793, at Maribo, in Laaland. Having completed his studies, he spent two years (1818-1820) in Germany, Italy, and France. While at Berlin, Schleiermacher exercised great influence upon his theology. In 1821 he was appointed lector, and soon afterwards professor of theology at Copenhagen. In 1874 he resigned his professorship, and died March 23, 1877. He wrote: Aurelius Augustinus Hippo. Sacra Scriptura Interpres (Copenh. 1837):—Quatuor Evangeliorum Tabula Synoptica, etc. (ibid. 1829):—Kirchenerfassung, Lehre und Ritus des Katholicismus und Protestantismus (from the Danish, by Fries, Neustadt, 1829, 3 vols.) :—Ueber den Theologischen Parteigeist (transl. by Wolf, ibid. 1832) :—Populäre Vorträge über die Reformation (transl. by Jennisen, Leips. 1837) :—Det Nye Testaments Hermeneutik (Copenhagen, 1840; German transl. by Schmidt - Phiseldick, Leips. 1841) :—Udklikning af de Christelige Hovldkerdomme (2d ed. ibid. 1845) :—Fortolkning af de Synoptiske Evangelier (ibid. 1847, 1850) :—Den Augsburgske Confession, Oversat og Belyst ved Historisk Dogmatisk (1851) :—Christelig Trykslaere (ibid. 1857). See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 227 sq.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Clausen, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Denmark, provost of Stubbiöbing, in the isle of Falster, who died at Assens in 1821, is the author of, Introductio in Epist. Jacobi (Göttingen, 1800) :—De Descensu J. Christi ad Inferos Historicus, etc. (Copenhagen, 1801). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 91, 599. (B. P.)

Clausnitzer, Tobias, a Lutheran minister of Sweden, was born in 1619 at Thum, near Annaberg. In the Thirty Years' War he was Swedish army-chaplain. He was member of consistory and rector at Pargstein and Weiden in Upper Palatinate, at his death, May 7, 1684. He composed some hymns, of which the best known is his Liebster Jesu, wir Sind Hier (Eng. transl. in Lyra Germ. ii, 99: "Blessed Jesus, at Thy Word"). See Koch, Gesch. der deutschen Kirchenlieder, iii, 354 sq. (B. P.)

Claustrals, or persons of the house; consisting, in a Benedictine monastery, of the abbot, prior major, sub-prior, third and fourth priors, who held chapter and collation, celebrated mass, and presided in hall, the precentor, master of the novices, and succentor.

Clausūra NIGROMANTICA was a sort of necromancy according to which anything unnatural can be brought into the human body without an outer injury, and also taken out of the body.

Clauswitz, Benedict Gottlieb, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 4, 1692, at Gross-Wiederitsch, near Leipsic. In the latter place he studied theology and philology, and was permitted, in 1711, to lecture on Greek and Hebrew languages, after having presented his De Epicteti ὑπερροφία καὶ ἀσοφία in iis, quæ ad Deum Pertinent. In 1718 he was made bachelor of theology, and in 1722 succeeded his father in the pastorate. In 1732 he was called as archdeacon to Merseburg, and six years later to Halle as professor of theology. He was made doctor of theology in 1739, and died May 8, 1749, leaving, Syntagma Doctrinæ de Fide in J. Chr. (Halle, 1748) :—De Luca Evangelista, Medico (Leips. 1740) :—De Mortuis Tempore Resurrectionis Christi Resuscitatis (ibid. 1741) :—De Analogia Inter Pentecosten Veteris et Novi Testamenti (ibid. eod.). See Döring, Die Gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 254 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 444, 570. (B. P.)

Clavenau, Ignaz, a German theologian of the order of the Benedictines, was born at Grütz in 1653. He spent his life in the affairs of his state and in instruction, and died in 1701. His works were published by order of his superiors nineteen years after his death, under the title: Ascesis, etc. (Salzburg, 1721, 4to). They include the following treatises: Vita Benedicti Moraliiter Exposita; Elucidarium in Regulam Ejusdem et in Formulam Professionis Benedictinæ; De Regendo Homine Exteriore; Tractatus de Arte Rhetorica, cum Appendice de Eloquentia Sacra pro Concionatoribus. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Claver, Pedro, a Spanish missionary of the order of the Jesuits, was sent in 1610 to the East Indies, where he devoted himself entirely to the relief of the colored slaves, prisoners, and poor. He died at Carthagena, Sept. 8, 1654. Benedict XIV declared, by a decree of 1747, that Claver possessed the divine and cardinal virtues for the degree of a hero. His Life has been written in Spanish, Italian, and finally in French (1751). See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Claveson, Charles de, a French religious poet, lived in 1615. He was knight of the order of the king, and sub-lieutenant of Hostun, Mercuroil, and Mureil. He took the names of Philostaur, Ami de la Croix, and Vieux Pupiste. He left Oraisons pour les Dimanches et Fêtes :—Sonnets in quatrain. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Claviger (key-beaver) is a canon who keeps the keys of the chapter seal and chests. There are usually two or three such officers at a time.

Clavigny, Jacques de la Marieuse de, a French theologian, was a native of Bayeux. He became canon in his native town, where he died in 1702, leaving, l'Essai de Guillaume le Conquérant (Bayeux, 1675, 12mo) :—Prières Tirées des Psaumes (1690, 12mo) :—Du Luxe Selon Tertullien, Basile et Augustin (12mo) :—L'Esprit des Psaumes. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Clavus is a band of arabesque embroidery or rich stuff of purple or other brilliant colors, worn on ecclesiastical vestments. The laticlave of the colobium was usually a wide band, reaching from the neck to the feet. In the chasuble it was pall-shaped, and called the pectoral, dorsal, onophorion, auriclave, and orphrey. It also occurs reaching no lower than the chest, where it is covered with roundels of metal and edged with little balls.

We continually find in ancient Christian frescos and mosaics garments decorated with long stripes of purple, sometimes enriched with embroidery or an inwoven pattern, called by this name. These generally run from the top to the bottom of the garment, and are broader or narrower according to the dignity of the wearer. Thus, the Lord is often distinguished by a broader clavus than those of the apostles, as in a fine fresco in the cemetery of St. Agnes. Unimportant persons also wore clavi, but very narrow. In nearly all cases these clavi are two in number, and run from each shoulder to the lower border of the dress. Tertullian (De Pallio, c. 4) speaks of the care which was taken in the selection of shades of color.

There are a few examples of the single clavus, running down the centre of the breast, which Rubenius believes was the ancient fashion of wearing it. These occur only in representations of the Three Children in the Fiery Furnace.

Clavi are common to both sexes; women may be seen represented with that ornament, for instance, in pictures of the Wise and Foolish Virgins; and female figures are sometimes found adorned with two clavi on each side. Jerome (Epist. 22, ad Eustochium) alludes to the use of the clavus by women, single as well as married. It is also common in early art to personages of the Old Testament and the New; it is given to Moses, for instance, and to the apostles, in nearly all representations of them, whether in fresco, in mosaic, or in glass. Angels also wear the clavus in early mosaics, in the Mosaicum of Basil, and in several ancient miniatures.

These purple stripes were worn on the penula as well as the tunic: a fresco from an arcusolium in the cemetery of Priscilla furnishes three examples. They are found also in the pallium: a mosaic of St. Agatha Major at Ravenna represents our Lord with clavi of gold on such a garment. The dalmatic and colobium were similarly decorated: the latter seems to have had only one broad band of purple descending from the upper part of the chest to the feet.

Priests, after the example of the senators of old Rome, are said to have worn the broad clavus, while deacons contented themselves with the narrow one on their tunics or dalmatics. The clavus is thus to some extent a mark of rank. The shorter kind, ornamented with small disks or spangles, and terminating in small globes or bullæ, is said to be the kind of decoration which is sometimes called pura- gauais. See Rubenius, De Re Vestiaria et Præripue de Lato Clavo (Antwerp, 1665).

Clawson, Samuel, a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Jefferson County, Pa., in 1806. He was converted when quite a youth, entered the ministry in 1834, became a member of the Pittsburgh Conference, afterwards joined the West Virginia Conference, and died at Weston, W. Va., in August, 1882. He was noted for his eccentricities, especially in the pulpit, which, however, added to, rather than detracted from, his power as a preacher. He was one of the most effective revivalists of his day. His natural eloquence was sometimes wonderful, and completely irresistible. In disposition he was as kind and affectionate as a child. He was several times elected representative to the General Conference. See Methodist Protestant Year-book, 1884, p. 36.

Claxton, Marshall, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Yarm, Jan. 1, 1779. He was a local preacher at the age of sixteen, entered the itinerancy in 1799, and died July 15, 1832. His disposition was amiable, his abilities solid, and his labors useful. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1832.

Claxton, Robert Bethell, D.D., an Episcopal minister, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1814. In 1838 he entered Yale College, and subsequently studied at the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Va. After his ordination he labored at different places until 1863, when he was called as professor of homiletics to the Divinity School at Philadelphia. In 1873 he resigned his professorship, and accepted the rectorship of St. Andrew's Church, West Philadelphia, where he died May 24, 1882. He was the author of a volume entitled Questions on the Gospels, and an occasional contributor to Church periodicals. (B. P.)

Clay, Eleazer, a Baptist minister, was born in Virginia, May 2, 1744. He was baptized in August, 1771, and ordained pastor at Chesterfield in 1775. Possessing a competent estate, he was able to assist his ministerial brethren who were suffering from persecution, and send relief to the families of those who had been thrown into prison. Within the limits of his own county he labored most faithfully as a minister of Christ, but was finally laid aside from the active duties of his vocation. He died May 2, 1836. He exerted a great influence among the churches in Chesterfield County, and for many years occupied the moderator's chair in the Middle District Association. See Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, p. 178. (J. C. S.)

Clay, John, an English Baptist minister, was born at Aberdeen, Scotland, Sept. 4, 1790, and, while a child, removed with his parents to England. He united with the Church at Portsea, March 22, 1797. In 1821 he became associate pastor at Festin, and in 1829 pastor of a church at Landport, where he remained several years. He died Jan. 25, 1841. See Report of English Baptist Union, 1841, p. 36. (J. C. S.)

Clay, Jonathan, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Buxton, Me., Dec. 13, 1775, and was converted in 1805. Soon after he began to preach, and was ordained in 1815. His family were supported by the fruits of his labor as a farmer, his services being for many years confined to his native place. Upon the formation of a second church in Buxton he became one of its members, and, for a time, its pastor. Ill-health obliged him to suspend his ministerial labors some time before his death, which occurred in 1850. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1850, p. 80. (J. C. S.)

Clay, Joseph, a Baptist minister, was born at Savannah, Ga., Aug. 16, 1764. He graduated at Princeton College in 1784 with the highest honors in his class, and was licensed to preach in 1804; in 1806 became associate pastor with Dr. Stillman in the First Baptist Church of Boston, and after the death of the latter had sole charge of the church. He was relieved from this work in 1809 on account of ill-health, and died Jan. 11, 1811. Mr. Clay was distinguished at both the bar and the bench. He wrote the original of the present constitution of Georgia. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 487.

Clay, Porter, a Baptist minister, son of Rev. John Clay, and brother of the statesman, Henry Clay, was born in Virginia in March, 1779, and removed to Kentucky with his mother in early life. He studied law, and occupied a position of civil trust under the government of the state. He united with the Church in 1815, and shortly after began to preach. He is said to have been a popular preacher, and greatly esteemed by the churches which he served. He died in 1850. See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 232. (J. C. S.)

Clay, Slatior, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born in New Castle, Del., Oct. 1, 1754. When a young man he studied law, and soon after began to practice. About 1780 he was induced by the captain of a vessel to sail with him to the West Indies on what he supposed would be a short voyage; but the war of the Revolution was in progress, and the vessel in which he was a passenger was captured by a British privateer. He was put ashore on the island of Antigua and abandoned, but soon after took passage in a vessel for New York, which was then in possession of the British. The ship, however, was taken by an American privateer, which was caught in a storm and wrecked on the rocks of Bermuda, where, nevertheless, Mr. Clay landed in safety. There being little prospect of his getting away from the island, he opened a school, and taught for six years. The events of his late voyage had produced in him great seriousness, which led to his devoting himself to the Christian ministry. His friends in Bermuda proposed to accept him as their pastor as soon as he should receive ordination from the bishop of London; but hearing of the consecration of bishop White in Philadelphia, and preferring to spend his life in his native land, he left Bermuda and arrived in Philadelphia in 1786. On Dec. 23 of the next year he was ordained deacon, and Feb. 17 following (1788) he was admitted to the order of presbyters. He became successively rector of St. James's Church, Perkiomen; of St. Peter's, Great Valley; and of St. David's, Radnor, all in Pennsylvania; and also assistant minister of Christ Church, in Upper Merion. In July, 1799, he removed to Perkiomen, near Norristown, and gave a part of his time to St. Thomas's Church in Whitemarsh. He died in Perkiomen, Sept. 25, 1821. Mr. Clay was a man of fervent piety. In the pulpit his manner was earnest and impressive. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 355.

Claybaugh, Joseph, D.D., an Associate Reformed minister, was born in Frederick County, Md., July 1, 1803, and removed to Ohio while young. In 1822 he graduated from Jefferson College; in 1824 was licensed, and accepted a call from the congregation at Chillicothe; in May, 1825, was ordained and installed pastor of that congregation, and shortly after took charge of Chillicothe Academy; in 1839 he was called to take charge of the Theological Seminary in Oxford, at the same time having charge of the congregation at Oxford, and continued in both relations till his death, Oct. 9, 1855. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 156.

Claybrook, Richard, a Baptist minister, was born in King William County, Va., Oct. 17, 1785. At the age of twenty-five he removed to Middlesex County, and made a profession of his faith in 1814. A few years after, the church which he had joined having lost its pastor, his brethren persuaded him to preach, and he was ordained in 1823. He also had charge of two or three other churches in different localities. He became eminently popular among all classes of hearers, and his ministry was greatly blessed. In 1831 he was called to the pastorate vacated by the death of

Rev. Robert B. Semple, in Bruington, King and Queen Co., where he remained a faithful, laborious servant of Christ until his death, Dec. 4, 1834. See Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, p. 348. (J. C. S.)

Clayes, DANA, a Congregational minister, was born in Framingham, Mass., Oct. 3, 1792. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1815, and from Andover Theological Seminary in 1820; was ordained at Meriden, N. H., July 4, 1821, and dismissed Oct. 17, 1837. From 1839 to 1842 he was acting pastor of the Bethel Church at Portland, Me.; in 1843 and 1844 home missionary in North Augusta, Vassalborough, Bremen, Washington, and Seabiscok; from 1844 to 1846 at Sidney, Windsor, Union, Jefferson, and Norridgewock; in 1847 at Industry and Mercer; in 1848 at Stark, and in 1849 and 1850 at Richmond, Swanville, and Mt. Desert. He was without charge at Wakefield, Mass., from 1851 until he supplied the Church at West Danvers, Me., in 1859. He died Oct. 23, 1877. (W. P. S.)

Clayhillis, ANDREW, a Scotch clergyman, was admitted to the living at Monifieth in 1569; transferred to Jedburgh before 1574, where he had four other places in charge; appointed visitor to the bounds of Teviotdale the same year, and was a member of twelve assemblies between 1574 and 1589; was at the head of the synod when they signed a declaration of unity in 1586; was transferred to Eckford in 1593; was a member of the General Assembly in 1596, and transferred to Monifieth, his first charge, in 1599; was a member of the Assembly in 1602; was presented by the king to the living at Monifieth in 1614; and died March 23, 1617, aged seventy years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 479, 494; iii, 723.

Clayton, Abner S., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Alabama, Dec. 1, 1802. He was converted at Shiloh in 1842, in 1843 became a member of Elyton Presbytery, and was ordained in 1844. In 1849 he removed to Itawamba County, Miss., where he labored faithfully until his death, May 1, 1859. As a preacher he was zealous and successful. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 191.

Clayton, Benjamin, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Farnley, near Leeds. He was converted at the age of fifteen, entered the sacred calling in 1822, and died suddenly, Oct. 11, 1851, aged fifty-four. He loved Methodism with an unwearied attachment. He brought all his powers into the service. He was kind and faithful, especially to the poor and suffering. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1852, p. 9.

Clayton, George, an English Congregational minister, was born in London, April 9, 1783. He early became imbued with the intelligent and pious characteristics of his parents, devoted himself to the service of God, and was put under special private instruction with the ministry in view, which was supplemented by a course at Hoxton Academy. In 1802 he became co-pastor at Southampton, and in 1804 was ordained pastor at Walworth, where he was a faithful, devoted, conscientious, and successful minister for over half a century. His last years were spent at Upminster, where he died, July 14, 1862. As a public man Mr. Clayton was well known for his advocacy of all kinds of religious enterprises; as prompt to speak from the platform as the pulpit; delivering his addresses with a tact and impressiveness which did equal credit to his head and heart. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1863, p. 219.

Clayton, Isaac, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Daisy Hill, near Bradford, Yorkshire, May 22, 1778. He was of pious parentage; was converted in 1793; sent to the Otley Circuit in 1800; admitted on trial at the conference of 1801, and travelled the Thetford, St. Neots, Northampton, Sevenoaks, London, Dover, Sheffield, Huddersfield, Keighley, Barnsley, and eight other circuits, the last being Cleckheaton. He died at Bradford, Oct. 23, 1833. Mr. Clayton was spiritual-minded, faithful, and conscientious. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1834; Wesl. Meth. Mag. 1836, p. 81 sq.

Clayton, John (1), A.M., a minister of the Church of England, and one of the Oxford Methodists, was the son of a Manchester bookseller, and was born in 1709. He was educated by the Rev. John Richards, A.M., at the Grammar School of Manchester; entered Brazenose College in 1726; became Hulme's exhibitor in 1729, and in 1732 a college tutor. In this year he was first introduced to John Wesley. Up to the time of Clayton's admission among the Oxford Methodists, the Bible had been their sole and supreme authority in faith and morals, their views were evangelical, and their lives free from the practice of monkish follies. At Clayton's suggestion they resolved to fast twice a week, and other extreme high-church tendencies began to manifest themselves at this time, chiefly through his influence. "They sought salvation by the practice of piety, good works, self-examination, prayer, sacramental attendance, fasting, diligence, kindness to the poor." In 1733 Clayton became minister of Salford Church. In 1736 Darcy Lever, Esq., sheriff of Lancashire, made him his chaplain. The friendship still continued between Clayton and Wesley, and when the latter was about to go to Georgia, he advised with Clayton, as well as with his brother Samuel, and William Law. After Wesley's conversion in 1738 we hear no more about friendship between Clayton and him. In 1745 Clayton became a Jacobite, in consequence of which he was suspended from his office as minister, and silenced for a time. In 1748 he resumed his ministerial duties. In the period of his silence he had established a classical school at Salford, which was very successful, many of its students becoming graduates of Oxford. For twenty years he was chaplain of the Collegiate Church of Manchester, and in 1760 was elected a fellow of it. He died Sept. 25, 1773. Perhaps as faithful a portrait of character as can be found is upon the monument erected to his memory in Collegiate Church by his old pupils, which describes him as of "manly cheerfulness, strict integrity, diffusive charity, heroic forgiveness, and serenity of temper under disappointments;" "guarding with judicious fidelity against the dangers of vice and the follies of ignorance by forming the man, the scholar, and the Christian in every mind submitted to his cultivation; a man of ardent zeal for true religion, warm attachment to the Church of England, and unwearied in the discharge of all the labors of a conscientious parish priest." See Tyerman, The Oxford Methodists, p. 24.

Clayton, John (2), an English Independent, was born at Clayton, near Chorley, Lancashire, Oct. 5, 1754. He was brought up in the Church of England, and studied for the medical profession. Coming to London, he heard the Rev. W. Romaine preach, which led to his resolve to study for the ministry, and he went to Trevecca College, where he had special facilities for making progress. He preached some time in Lady Huntingdon's Connection, then joined the Independents, after reading Towgood's Letters. In 1778 he was ordained pastor at the Weighhouse, Little Eastcheap. He made for himself a high reputation; was one of the foremost ministers among the dissenters; one of the Merchants' Lecturers, and two of his sons followed him in that office. He preached sermons on various public occasions, which were printed, including those at the ordination of his sons, John and George. His sermon in 1791, against the Birmingham riots, was answered by the Rev. Robert Hall. Three of his sons became Independent ministers, and The Clayton Family Memorials is the title of a volume by T. W. Aveling (Lond. 1867), which includes memoirs of the father and his three sons. The father died Sept. 23, 1843. See Wilson, Dissenting Churches, i, 201.

Clayton, John (3), an English Congregational minister, was born in London in 1780. He was educated partly at Homerton, with a session or two in Scotland, and was ordained at Kensington in 1801. Subsequently he became pastor of Poultry Chapel, London, where he labored for thirty years. He died at Bath, Oct. 3, 1865. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1866, p. 212.

Clayton, Joseph, an English Baptist minister, was born at Gamlingay, Cambridgeshire, Feb. 3, 1710. His parents were, in his early days, connected with the Established Church, but subsequently his mother became a member of a dissenting society. Upon the decease of his father Joseph was placed in the care of an uncle, and brought up in the occupation of husbandry. He was bigotedly attached to the Established Church, although notoriously wicked. He was converted, however, and united with a Baptist Church, and in 1735 was licensed to preach. He was ordained pastor of the Church at Steventon, June 5, 1751, and, after a useful and cheerful ministry, died Sept. 10, 1790. See Ripon Register, i, 491-493. (J. C. S.)

Clayton, Joshua A., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Florida, N. Y., Feb. 10, 1805. He graduated from Union College in 1822; studied theology for over two years in Princeton Theological Seminary, and was ordained by the presbytery of Watertown, Nov. 10, 1826. He became stated supply at Ellisburgh, N. Y., in 1825; preached there as pastor from 1826 to 1828; was stated supply at Brunswick in 1829; at Moreau, from 1830 to 1834; at Hebron, from 1835 to 1839; at Second Church, Plymouth, Mich., from 1840 to 1846; stated supply and missionary in Michigan and Kentucky, from 1846 to 1857, and also at Oakland, Mich., from 1857 to 1865. He died at Plymouth, Dec. 25, 1872. See Gen. Cat. of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1881, p. 38.

Clayton, William, was one of the pioneers of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Middle and West Tennessee, uniting with the Tennessee Conference soon after its organization in 1866. He labored in Wayne, Lawrence, and Giles counties, and, completely broken down by labors, exposure, and disease, accepted a supernumerary relation, with an appointment to Summertown. He died in Giles County, Tenn., March 15, 1880, aged forty-five. Mr. Clayton combined strength, gentleness, firmness, courage, generosity, and possessed remarkable influence in his native county. He was a popular preacher alike in town and backwoods. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 315.

Cleave, William, an English Congregational minister, was born in London, April 11, 1851. At the age of fifteen he went to India, and passed three years among the coffee plantations of his relatives; then returned to England, and studied at Nottingham and at Cheshunt College. In 1874 he supplied the pulpit at Chertsey, Surrey, the next year became the settled pastor, and pastor at East Dereham, Norfolk, in August, 1878. He died May 30, 1880. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 362.

Cleaveland, Eli, a Baptist minister, was born in Wilkes County, N. C., Oct. 1, 1781. He united with the Church in 1803, and not long after was ordained. From 1813 to 1818 he preached in Knox County, Tenn. In 1821 he removed to Monroe County, and there labored successfully for thirty-eight years, building up a great many churches, and being instrumental in the conversion of many persons. He was pastor, gratuitously, for several years of the Sweetwater Church, which, under his ministry, greatly increased in strength. He died Nov. 23, 1859. See Borum, Sketches of Tenn. Ministers, p. 176-178. (J. C. S.)

Cleaveland, Elisha Lord, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Topsfield, Me., in April, 1806. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1829, having experienced religion in his senior year; also from Andover Theological Seminary in 1832. He was ordained pastor of the Third Church in New Haven in July, 1833, where his ministry continued for thirty-three years, during the early part of which he passed through many trying scenes, owing to differences of religious opinions in his Church, and pecuniary embarrassments of the society, but at length succeeded in securing the erection of an attractive church edifice, and laying the foundation of a prominent and strong religious society in New Haven. He died Feb. 16, 1866. Constitutionally conservative, yet, when the hour of trial came in the history of the country, he was a bold, outspoken Christian patriot. While travelling in 1864, both in France and in England, he pleaded the cause of liberty and union with most convincing eloquence. See History of Bowdoin College, p. 391-393. (J. C. S.)

Cleaveland, John Payne, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Hyfield, Mass., July 19, 1799. His father was the distinguished Parker Cleaveland, M.D., and his brother, professor Parker Cleaveland of Bowdoin College. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1821, and spent one year (1823-24) in theological study at Andover. He was ordained at Salem, Mass., Feb. 14, 1827, pastor of the Tabernacle Church in that city, where he remained seven years. Shortly afterwards he went to Michigan, and was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Detroit from June 15, 1835, to Nov. 1, 1838, at which date he became president of Marshall College, Michigan. He held this office five years, during a part of this period acting as pastor of the Church of which, previously, he had been the preacher. Early in 1844 he was called to the Second Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati, where he remained two years, and then removed to Providence, R. I., where he was pastor of the Beneficent Church from April 22, 1846, to March 30, 1853. He there distinguished himself as a strong advocate of temperance and anti-slavery, and gained many warm friends. After leaving Providence he was pastor of the First Church, Northampton, Mass., from April 20, 1853, to July 11, 1855; from Oct. 2, 1855, to Jan. 15, 1862, of the Appleton Street Church, Lowell. During a part of 1862 he was chaplain of the 30th Massachusetts Volunteers. On leaving the army he was for some time a supply of the Park and Salem Streets churches, Boston. He also preached for brief periods in one or two other churches. He died at Newburyport, Mass., March 7, 1873. See Memorials of R. I. Congregational Ministers; Andover Trien. Cat. 1870, p. 60. (J. C. S.)

Cleaveland, Nathan, a Baptist minister, was born at Horton, N. S., in 1777. After itinerating for some time in the province, he settled as pastor at Onslow in 1809; continued till 1818; then was pastor at Hopewell, N. B., for ten years; and retired to Alma, where he died, June 31, 1869. See Bill, Hist. of Baptists in the Maritime Provinces, p. 262.

Cleaver, Charles, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Brackley, England, June 11, 1815. His parents, who were members of the Church of England, strongly opposed his union with the Wesleyan Church, but although only fifteen when converted, he was true to his convictions, and his endurance of rebuke and suffering were rewarded by seeing both his parents unite with the communion which they once despised. At nineteen he entered the local ministry of that church, and remained in it until he came to the United States in 1844. On arriving at Baltimore he continued as a local preacher until 1853, when he joined the Baltimore Conference, in which he labored until 1876, and was then made supernumerary, which relation was changed to supernuminate in 1878, and so continued till his death at Hereford, Md., Nov. 25, 1880. Mr. Cleaver was a faithful, earnest, and efficient preacher, very successful in revival and pastoral work. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 71.

Cleaver, Euseby, D.D., archbishop of Dublin, was born in Buckinghamshire in 1746, and received his education in Christ Church, Oxford, where he took the degree of master of arts in 1770, and in 1778 that of doctor of divinity. In 1783 he was preferred to the rectory of Tillington and another benefice in Sussex. In 1787 he accompanied the marquis of Buckingham to Ireland. In March, 1789, he was consecrated bishop of Cork; in June of the same year was translated to the sees of Leighlin and Ferns; and in 1809 obtained the archiepiscopal dignity. He died at Tunbridge Wells in 1819. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Abps. of Dublin, p. 352.

Cleaver, Robert, an English Puritan divine, who died in 1613, published Sermons (1613-14):—The Sabbath (1630):—and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cleaver, William (1), D.D., an English prelate, was born in 1742. He was educated at the University of Oxford; became prebendary of Westminster in 1784; principal of Brazenose College in 1785; bishop of Chester in 1787; was translated to Bangor in 1800; to St. Asaph in 1806, and died May 15, 1815. Bishop Cleaver was an able Greek scholar and an orthodox divine. He published De Rhythmo Græcorum Liber (Lond. 1789, 8vo):—Sermons (1773, 1791, 1794):—a collection of his own and his father's sermons (1808, 8vo): Sermons on Select Subjects (8vo):—A List of Books Recommended to the Clergy and Younger Students in Divinity (Oxford, 1791, 8vo; 3d ed. enlarged, with Dodworth's Catalogue of the Christian Writers and Genuine Works of the First Three Centuries, 1808, 8vo). See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1815, p. 125; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Cleaver, William (2), a Wesleyan Methodist minister, was born at Trinidad in 1818. He was converted under the ministry of William Moister, in Port-of-Spain; offered himself for the ministry in 1840; left many enduring monuments of his labors during his thirty-five years' work among the West Indian colonies, and died in his native island, April 19, 1878. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1878, p. 55.

Cledog. See CLYDOG.

Cledonius, a trusted friend and correspondent of Gregory Nazianzen, who addressed to him his two celebrated letters against Apollinaris. The second of these was a reply to one of Cledonius, asking him to declare his belief as to the person of Christ. In it Gregory begs Cledonius to assure all that he held the Nicene creed inviolate. These letters were adopted as documents of faith by the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon (Gregory Nazianzen, Orat. 51, 52).

Cledrêdus is one of the many Welsh saints who are arranged in the lists collectively as "the children of Brychan," the king of Brecknock, at one time a centre of missionary enterprise, and in which numerous inscribed stones and other early Christian memorials are found. See Hubner, Inscriptiones Britannia Christiana.

Cleef, Jan van, an eminent Flemish painter, was born at Venloo, in Guelderland, in 1646, and studied under Primo Gentile at Brussels, and afterwards under Gaspar de Crayer. He gained a great reputation, his works being very numerous in Flanders and in Brabant. In the Church of St. James, at Ghent, is a fine picture of The Assumption; in that of St. Nicholas, an excellent picture of Magdalene at the Feet of Christ; in that of St. Michael, an ingenious composition representing The Immaculate Conception, with Adam and Eve in the lower part of the picture. Van Cleef died at Ghent in 1716. See Hoefer, Now. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Cleef, Martin van, a Flemish historical painter, was born at Antwerp in 1520, and was a scholar of Francis Floris. He painted several pictures for the churches, and died about 1570. See Hoefer, Now. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Clegg, William (1), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Bury, Lancashire, in 1787. He was converted at nineteen; entered the ministry in 1806; retired therefrom in 1846, settling in Boston, and died suddenly at Hull, April 11, 1848. He travelled sixteen circuits. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1848.

Clegg, William (2), an English Wesleyan minister, son of the foregoing, was born at Perth in 1814. He was educated at Woodhouse Grove School, and relinquished promising prospects as a medical student to enter the ministry, in 1838. From 1841 to 1844 he had care of an English congregation in Calais, France. When laid aside by sickness in 1851, he retired to Ventnor, Isle of Wight. He subsequently took a voyage to Australia, returning in December, 1853, and died on the 9th of the same month. He was a man of good attainments, pious, and modest. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1854.

Clegg, William F., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born near Pittsborough, Chatham Co., N. C., Aug. 10, 1827. He was converted in early life, and received into the North Carolina Conference in 1852, from which time he was one of the most active and useful ministers in his conference, until a short time before his death, June 16, 1875. Mr. Clegg was pre-eminently pious, but a great sufferer physically. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 160.

Cleghorn, Elisha Burnham, a Presbyterian minister, was born at De Kalb, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., Sept. 27, 1812. He received his preparatory education at Potsdam Academy, and afterwards at Ogdensburg, under professor Taylor Lewis; studied in the Oneida Institute (1833-35), but never graduated from any college; taught (1835-41) partly in St. Lawrence County, and partly at Frederickstown, Mo.; afterwards was engaged (1841-50) in mercantile life. He then studied at Princeton Seminary two years, after spending one year in study before matriculation; was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, July 7, 1852; labored as agent of the American Colonization Society in the south-west from 1853 to 1855; was ordained by the Presbytery of Baltimore, June 3, 1856; was pastor of the Island Church in Washington, D. C., until 1858; agent of the South-western Bible Society, and associate editor of The True Witness, at New Orleans, until 1861; superintendent of the Presbyterian Publication House in New Orleans, until 1866; missionary in New York city from 1867 to 1872; in the book business in Cincinnati the following year; an evangelist in Philadelphia and vicinity to 1875; an evangelist in New York city and vicinity for three years; stated supply at Conklingville and Day churches, N. Y., in 1878 and 1879, and after that resided in Philadelphia until his death, Dec. 14, 1881. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1882, p. 49; Presbyterian, Dec. 24, 1881.

Cleghorn, John, a Scotch minister, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1699; was licensed Aug. 7, 1700; called to Burntisland, and ordained in 1701; transferred to Wemyss in 1711, and died Feb. 22, 1744, aged about sixty-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, ii, 531, 563.

Cleghorn, Matthew, a Scotch clergyman (son of the minister at Wemyss), was licensed to preach in 1737; presented to the living at Rousay and Eglisbay in 1747, and ordained; transferred to St. Andrews and Deerness in 1752; thence went to Dryfesdale in 1763, and died June 17, 1781, aged seventy years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 648; iii, 387, 416.

Cleghorn, Thomas (1), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1796, presented to the living at Smailholm the same year, resigned in March, 1843, and died Dec. 12, 1847. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, i, 532.

Cleghorn, Thomas (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Ogdensburg, N. Y., in 1821. He experienced conversion in early life; received a good education, and in 1846 entered the travelling connection of the Wesleyan Church in Canada. In 1871 he was transferred to the Michigan Conference, and at the time of his death, Feb. 24, 1878, was serving his sixth charge in that body. Mr. Cleghorn rapidly rose to the occupancy of important fields. He was characterized by sound judgment, solid culture, and deep piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 17.

Cleghornie, GEORGE, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1597, was appointed the first minister of the new parish of Dornock in 1612, and continued in that charge in August, 1647, being then in old age. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 616.

Cleia, in Greek mythology, was an Atlantid, and the sister of Hyas, over whose death by a wild boar all the sisters were so grieved that out of sympathy the gods placed them among the stars as Hyades. They still weep over their brother, and the rise of this constellation with the sun is said to bring rain.

Cleland, George (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1637; was chaplain to lady Yester in 1645; appointed to the living at Morton in 1648; continued in 1661, and died before 1685. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 681.

Cleland, George (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1671; was appointed minister at Durrissleer in 1679, and died before Dec. 19, 1683, aged about thirty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 673.

Cleland, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1633; was licensed to preach in 1638; presented to the living at Stow in 1640, and ordained; joined the protesters in 1651, and died in August, 1665, aged about fifty-two years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 533.

Cleland, John (2), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1662; admitted to the living at Middlebie in 1663; transferred to Traquair in 1666, and died before May 8, 1672. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 257, 623.

Cleland (or Clelland), Joseph, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1613; was licensed to preach in 1614; removed to Wigton in 1616; was appointed to the living at Kirkcown in 1627, and continued in 1641. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 733.

Cleland, Robert, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1691; was licensed to preach in 1695; called to the living at Newburn in 1696, and ordained; transferred to Kilmenny in 1700, and died in August, 1711, aged about forty years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 441, 453.

Cleland, Thomas, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1725; became tutor to John Maxwell, and afterwards chaplain to lady Stewart; was licensed to preach in 1734; called to the living at Cambusnethan in 1738, and ordained in 1739; transferred to Stirling in 1763, and died July 31, 1769, aged sixty-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 275, 676.

Cleland, Thomas Horace, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Glasgow, Ky., in 1819. He graduated at Centre College in 1840, at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1845, and was licensed to preach by the Transylvania Presbytery in April, 1846. The same year he went to Louisiana, and became a stated supply at Lake Providence; in 1854 removed to Natchez, Miss., and for one year supplied the Church at Pine Ridge, in that vicinity; also supplied Union Church for one or two years, and afterwards the Second Church in Natchez for several years. After the civil war he was principal of the Fayette Female Academy. In 1868 he returned to Kentucky, but in 1871 settled at Delhi, La., becoming a member of the Presbytery of Red River. At Delhi he acted as stated supply to the Church, and established a private school; also preached frequently at Talulah and other places. He died Feb. 17, 1878. Mr. Cleland was a faithful and useful preacher, and a successful teacher. See Necrol. Report of Princeton Theol. Sem. 1878, p. 28.

Clémence, JOSEPH GUILLAUME, a French theologian, was born at Havre, Oct. 9, 1717. He was successively pastor of St. Claude, Rouen, grand-vicar of Poitiers, and prior of St. Martin de Machecoul, and died Aug. 6, 1792, leaving Défense des Livres de l'Ancien Testament (Paris, 1768):—Les Caractères du Messie Vérifiés en Jésus-Christ (ibid. 1776, 2 vols. 8vo):—L'Authenticité des Livres tant du Nouveau que de l'Ancien Testament (ibid. 1782); reprinted under the title, Réutation de la Bible enfin Expliquée, de Voltaire, etc. (Nancy, 1826, 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clémencet, CHARLES, a French Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, was born about 1704 at Painblanc, in Autun; joined his order in 1723 at Vendôme, and died at the monastery Blancs-Manteaux, in Paris, April 5, 1778. His chief productions are, L'Art des Vérifier les Dates, etc. (Paris, 1750; an important work, conceived and imperfectly executed by Maurice d'Antine, revised by Clémencet, and completed by François Clément):—Histoire Générale de Port-Royal (Amsterdam, 1755, 10 vols.):—Histoire Générale des Écrivains de Port-Royal (ibid. 1770). See Jöcher, Encyclopædie Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Clemency (or Mercy) was deified by the Greeks, and had an altar in Athens, erected by the kindred of Hercules; and a temple dedicated to her by order of the Roman senate, after the death of Julius Cæsar, on some of whose denarii this goddess appears. The poets describe her as the guardian of the world, and picture her as holding a branch of laurel, or olive, and a spear, to show that gentleness and pity ought principally to distinguish victorious warriors. The Greeks and Romans gave the name of asylum to the temples they erected to this goddess.

Clemens is the name of several early Christians:

1. Flavius, son of Dabinius, brother of the emperor Vespasian, and therefore first cousin of Domitian, whose niece, Flavia Domitilla, was his wife. Flavius Clemens held the consulate in A.D. 95, and had just resigned the office when he and his wife were arrested and convicted on the charge of "atheism," undoubtedly referring to Christianity. They were accused, according to Dio Cassius, of "Judaizing;" from which, in the popular mind, Christianity was hardly distinguishable. Clemens suffered death, and his wife, Domitilla, was banished to one of the islands off the west coast of Italy (Sueton. Domit. § 15; Dio Cassius, Hist. lxxvii, 14; Merivale, Romans Under the Empire, vii, 383; Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 22). See DOMITILLA.

2. Bishop of Ancyra and martyr under Diocletian and Maximian, A.D. 296; commemorated Jan. 23. He is said to have been the son of a heathen father and a Christian mother, Euphrosyne, who prophesied his martyrdom. The narrative relating to him is very doubtful (Tillemont, Mémoires, v, 162).

3. A Greek historian and chronologer. His date is very uncertain, but probably he lived in the 5th century.

4. One of the Irish missionaries who opposed St. Boniface while enforcing submission to the papal authority in Germany, as part of the Christian law. Clement, and Adelbert, a Frankish bishop, were condemned and excommunicated at a Roman synod held in 745 or 748 by pope Zachary at the instigation of Boniface. Clement probably died in prison (Neander, Ch. Hist. v, 77 sq.; Bonifacius, Opp. ii, pass.; Mosheim, Ecccl. Hist. per. i, cent. viii, c. 5; Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. p. 326, 327).

5. A Hibernian or Scot, who went over to Gaul about the beginning of Charlemagne's reign (A.D. 772), and was well received by that monarch. St. Clemens was intrusted with the education of boys of all classes, and was made responsible to the king for their progress. But little is known of him except that the fame of his name attracted scholars even from Germany. The chief authority upon his life is the anonymous monk of St. Gall, in his two books, De Gestis Caroli Mag., in Canisius, Antiq. Lect. ii, pt. iii, 57. He is commemorated March 20.

Clemens, Franz Jakob, a Roman Catholic philosopher of Germany, was born in 1815 at Coblenz. He studied at Bonn and Berlin from 1834 to 1838, and was made doctor of philosophy at the latter place in 1839. In 1840 he commenced his philosophical lectures at Bonn. In 1853 he opposed the school of the famous philosopher Günther, and the result was that in 1857 the Güntherian philosophy was condemned by the pope, as twenty years before the Hermesian system was stigmatized. Clemens was called to Münster as professor of philosophy in 1855, and died at Rome, Feb. 24, 1862. He published, De Philosophia Anaxagoræ Clazomenii (Bonn, 1840):—Giordano Bruno und Nicolaus von Cusa (ibid. 1847):—De Scholasticorum Sententia, Philosophiam esse Theologie Ancillam (Münster, 1856):—Der heilige Rock zu Trier und die protestantische Kritik (2d ed. Coblenz, 1845):—Die Wahrheit in dem von Herrn J. v. Kuhn in Tübingen angeregten Streite über Philosophie und Theologie (Münster, 1860). See Literarischer Handweiser für das Katholische Deutschland, 1862, col. 88; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 230. (B. P.)

Clemens, John W., a German Reformed minister, was born at New Berlin, Union Co., Pa., Jan. 27, 1838. In 1866 he was licensed, and ordained at Littlestown, Adams Co., Pa.; became pastor at St. Clair, Schuylkill Co., in 1868, and in 1871 at Conyngham, where he remained until his death, Sept. 11, 1880. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, v, 405.

Clemens, William, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Wheeling, West Va., Sept. 13, 1825. He was converted in 1843, and joined the First Presbyterian Church of Wheeling; graduated from Washington College, Washington, Pa., in 1850, and from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1853. He was licensed by the Washington Presbytery the same year, and sent as a missionary to the western coast of Africa, where he spent the remainder of his life. He died at sea, June 24, 1862. Mr. Clemens was a man of great humility, and was devoted to his work. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1863, p. 149.

Clement, a Scotch prelate, was a Dominican friar, and was consecrated to the see of Dunblane in 1233. He probably died in 1258. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 172.

Clement of ALEXANDRIA's hymn. See HOMION POLON ADAON.

Clément, Augustin Jean Charles, a French prelate and canon, was born at Creteil in 1717. He was ordained at Auxerre, and became treasurer of the Church there. Clément favored the views of the Port-Royalists, and in 1752 made his first journey to Holland in their cause. In 1755 he was elected deputy for the provincial assembly of Sens. From 1758 to 1768 he travelled in Spain, Holland, and Italy, in order to propagate his religious ideas. In 1786 he resigned his treasuryship and retired to Livry, which, however, did not save him from being incarcerated in 1794. In 1797 he was elected bishop of Versailles by the constitutional clergy, but he renounced this office at the time of the concordat. He died March 13, 1804, leaving, Mémoire sur le Rang que Tiennent les Chapitres dans l'Ordre Ecclésiastique (1779):—Lettres à l'Auteur (Larrière) des Observations sur le Nouveau Rituel de Paris (1787, 12mo):—Des Elections des Evêques et de la Manière d'y Procéder (Paris, 1790, 8vo):—Formes Canoniques du Gouvernement Ecclésiastique, etc. (ibid. 1790, 8vo):—Principes de l'Unité du Culte Public (ibid. 1790):—Lettre Clément, Claude, a French theologian, was born at Ornans-sur-le-Loué (Franche-Comté). He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1612, and taught rhetoric at Lyons, then at Dôle. He was sent to Spain, where he was professor of polite literature, spending his leisure hours in the study of theology and archaeology. He died at Madrid in 1642, leaving, Clemens IV, etc. (Lyons, 1623, 1624, 12mo):—Bibliotheca Lugdunensis, etc. (ibid. 1628, 8vo):—Bibliotheca Escorialis (ibid. 1635, 4to):—Chronological Tables of Spanish History (in Spanish, Madrid, 1643; Mayence and Valence, 1689). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clément, Denis Xavier, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Dijon, Oct. 6, 1706. He was doctor of theology and abbot of Marcheroux. Stanislaus, king of Poland, took him as his preacher, and he was also confessor to the aunts of Louis XV. He received, in his old age, the deanery of Ligny, and died March 7, 1771, leaving, Entretiens de l'Âme, etc. (Paris, 1740):—Oraison Funèbre de la Reine de Sardaigne (ibid. 1741):—Sermon sur la Dédicace de l'Eglise des Petits-Pères (ibid.):—Panegyrique du Bienheureux Alexandre Pauli, Théatin (ibid. 1743):—Heures et Prières pour Remplir Saintement les Principaux Devoirs des Chrétiens (ibid. 1756), etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clement, Edwin, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Red Hook, N. Y., April 13, 1832. He was converted at nineteen, while a student at the New York Conference Seminary; served the Church as class-leader and local preacher; in 1855 entered the New York Conference; and died Feb. 20, 1877. Mr. Clement's strong characteristics were great promptness, excellency as a preacher, and piety as a man. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 45.

Clément, François, a learned French historian, was born at Bèze, near Dijon, in 1714. He studied at the college of the Jesuits at Dijon, and became a Benedictine of St. Maur in 1731. At the age of twenty-five he was exhausted by literary work, and had to suspend it for ten years. He then entered the house of the Blancs-Manteaux at Paris, and was engaged to continue L'Histoire Littéraire de la France, of which he finished the eleventh and twelfth volumes, bringing it down to the year 1167. Clément rendered to chronology a service not less important. Maurice d'Antine had conceived the idea of a large work, entitled L'Art de Vérifier les Dates, the object of which was to prove in an exact manner the dates of historical facts; but his chronology was full of errors and omissions. Clément (q. v.) executed this task more completely, and Clément issued a new edition much superior to either of the old. The first volume appeared in 1783, the second in 1784, and the third in 1787; the tables were added in 1792. This grand work, the fruit of thirteen years' assiduous labor, is one of the greatest monuments of scholarship of that time. The king recompensed Clément by appointing him official historian of France, and the academy of inscriptions admitted him in 1785 to the number of its associated members. The revolution having destroyed the religious communities, had also interrupted the scientific works of the Benedictines. Clément retired to the house of his nephew, Duboy-Laverne, director of the national printing, where, in spite of his advanced age, he occupied himself with ardor in perfecting his great work. He had revised a large part of it, when he was attacked by apoplexy, and died March 29, 1793. M. Viton de Saint-Alais, who had bought the MS., published a new edition of the work, with the continuation (1818, 1819, 18 vols. 8vo; or 5 vols. 4to); but this edition is less esteemed than the preceding. Viton also published the posthumous work of Clément containing the dates before the Christian era. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clement, Henry, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in London, England, and emigrated to western New York in his boyhood. He was converted in early life; graduated at Genesee College; taught school several years; entered business in Baltimore, Md.; began preaching in 1868 on Sweet Spring Circuit; and in 1869 was admitted into the Virginia Conference, and appointed to Rockbridge Circuit. His subsequent stations were Highland, Pocahontas, Herndon, Leesburg, Rockbridge, Rockingham, and Amherst. He died suddenly, Feb. 9, 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 18.

Clement, John, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Great Britain. On his emigration to America, his credentials were approved by the synod of Virginia, Sept. 18, 1718. He received a call from Pocomoke, Va., and was ordained in June, 1719; but before a year complaint was made to the synod, and that body suspended him. On his full confession, suspension was removed, and Philadelphia Presbytery employed him to preach at Gloucester and Pillsbury; but he was again suspended, and no further mention is made of him. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in America, 1857.

Clement, Jonathan, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Danville, Vt., June 20, 1797. After graduating in 1818 from Middlebury College, he studied theology two years at Andover, and from 1820 to 1830 was an instructor in Phillips Academy. He was ordained pastor in Chester, N. H., Oct. 13, 1830, and was dismissed Sept. 10, 1845. From Feb. 3, 1847, to May 19, 1852, he was pastor in Topsham, Me.; and from July 14, 1852, to June 12, 1867, in Woodstock, Vt. After this he resided in Norwich, Conn., but supplied the Quebec Church in Hartford from 1869 to 1874; and died Sept. 6, 1881. He published several Addresses and Sermons. See Cong. Year-book, 1882, p. 25.

Clement, Joshua, a Baptist minister, was born at Hopkinton, N. H., in May, 1803, and united with the Church in that place at an early age. He was ordained at Dorchester about 1833, and preached in the states of Vermont and New Hampshire nearly fifty years. His last pastorate was in Chester, N. H., which he resigned in 1879. He preached his last sermon at Cotuit, Mass., in April, 1883, and died at Chester, June 29, following. See The Watchman, July 12, 1883. (J. C. S.)

Clément (AUGUSTE DE BAVIÈRE), Marie Hyacinthe, a Belgian prelate, was born at Brussels Aug. 16, 1700, and studied at Rome under the direction of Clement XI. He was nominated coadjutor of the bishop of Ratisbon Dec. 19, 1715, and was elected bishop of Münster and Paderborn in March, 1719. The death of his uncle, Joseph Clément, whose coadjutor he had been, having left the see of Cologne vacant, he took possession of it in 1723, and in the spring of 1724 was elected bishop of Hildesheim, and consecrated Nov. 10, 1727. The bishopric of Osnabrück was assigned to him Nov. 4, 1728, and on July 17 he was elected grand-master of the order of Teutonic knights. After the death of the emperor Charles VI of Germany, in 1740, Clément supported the pretensions of Charles Albert, elector of Bavaria, to the empire, and, on Jan. 24, 1742, crowned him emperor at Frankfort. The Austrian army was victorious, and Clément made peace with Maria Theresa. In 1745 he assisted at the coronation of Francis of Lorraine. In 1761 he projected a journey to Bavaria, but on the way he died suddenly at Treves, Feb. 5, 1761. This prelate had for his motto, "Non mihi, sed populo;" and he justified it by the good which he did to his diocese. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clement, Tisdale S., a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Monroe, Me., Dec. 8, 1810. He united with the Church in 1824; was licensed June, 1849, and ordained in June, 1850. For several years he was pastor in his native town; in 1863, removed to Exeter; after a three years' pastorate in that place, went to Plymouth, and, during his residence there, he preached a part of the time for the Unity, Dixmont, and Carmel churches. In the spring of 1869 he took charge of a mission society in South Boston, which was soon organized into a church. In 1872 he removed to Richmond Corner, Me., and in 1875 to Lewiston, where he died, July 12, 1881. His ministry was very successful. See Morning Star, June 14, 1882. (J. C. S.)

Clementi, PROSPERO, an eminent Italian sculptor, was born at Reggio about 1504. Among his principal works was the tomb of the Prati family, in the cathedral at Parma, and the tomb of G. Androssi, bishop of Mantua, in the cathedral of that city. In the cathedral of Reggio are two admirable statues of Adam and Eve. He died in 1584. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Clementianus. (1) See NINUS. (2) Said by Victor Vitensis, in the beginning of his second book on the Vandal invasion, to have had inscribed on his thigh, "Manichæus Christi discipulus."

Clementine Liturgy. See LITURGY.

Clementinus was a martyr at Heraclea, commemorated Nov. 14 in Usuard's and the Hieronymian martyrologies.

Clements, CASTOR, an Irish Wesleyan minister, commenced his ministry in 1804, and continued for twenty-six years. He became a supernumerary in 1830, residing in Lifford. Purposing to remove his family to America, he sailed from Liverpool on Feb. 11, 1837; but the vessel was wrecked on the Irish coast, and all on board were lost. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1837.

Clemm, HEINRICH WILHELM, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 31, 1725, at Hohen-Asperg. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1754 professor and preacher at Behenhausen, in 1761 professor at the gymnasium in Stuttgart, and in 1767 at Tübingen, where he died, July 28, 1775. He wrote, De Limitibus Creaturarum (Tübingen, 1745):—Ob die Heil. Schriften Dunkel und Zweideutig wären (ibid. 1753):—Versuch einer Kritischen Geschichte der Hebr. Sprache (ibid. eod.):—Vollständige Einleitung in die Religion und Gesamnte Theologie (1765-72, 7 vols.):—Diss. de Origine ac Significatione Vocis λόγος (ibid. 1767):—Diss. de Probanda et non Probanda Trinitate ex 1 Joh. v, 7 (ibid. eod.):—Diss. qua Nexus Verborum Rom. xi, 5, Vindicatur (ibid. 1771), etc. See Moser, *Württemberg. Clemdinnen, JOHN C., an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born in County Down in 1770, of Presbyterian parents. He entered the work in 1796; endured hardship during the rebellion of 1798; labored long and faithfully; became a supernumerary in 1831, residing first at Newtownbarry and then (1841) at Bideford, where he died, Feb. 6, 1855. He was humble, long-suffering, gentle, and meek. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1855; West. Meth. Magazine, 1855, p. 854; Stevenson, The Methodist Hymn-book and its Associations (Lond. 1870, 12mo), p. 268.

Clenney, PARLEY W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Anson County, N. C., Oct. 17, 1812. He was converted in 1828, and admitted into the South Carolina Conference in 1832, in which he labored with zeal and fidelity until his death, Oct. 5, 1835. He was deeply pious. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1836, p. 406.

Cleobians. In a fragment of Hegesippus preserved by Eusebius (H. E. iv, 22), we have an enumeration of some of the earliest heretics: "Simon, whence are the Simonians; Cleobius, whence the Cleobians (Κλε-οβρυοί), etc." Cleobius is rarely mentioned by ecclesiastical writers. He, together with Simon, is accused of the forgery of apocryphal books (Ap. Const. vi, 16). Pseudo-Chrysostom, in the 48th homily on St. Matthew (vol. vi, p. cxcix), names Dositheus, Simon, and Cleobius among the false teachers who came in the name of Christ in fulfilment of our Lord's prophecy (Matt. xxiv, 5).

Cleobius is a person (different from the one named in the foregoing article) mentioned in the legendary life of Epiphanius (Her. ii, 320) as his instructor in Christianity.

Cleobulus. See CLAUDIUS (1).

Cleomēnēs, a teacher of Patristian doctrines at Rome in the beginning of the 3d century, under the episcopate of Zephyrinus, who tolerated him in the Church. Hippolytus states that Cleomenes learned these doctrines from Epigonus, a disciple of Noetus, who had brought them to Rome (Refut. ix, 3, 7, 10; x, 27).

Cleonīcus, martyred A.D. 296, is commemorated in the Byzantine calendar on March 3.

Cleōphas, a martyr at Emmaus, is commemorated Sept. 25 in the old Roman and Usuard's martyrologies.

Clephane, George, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1683; was licensed to preach in 1697, and ordained minister at Newtyle in 1698. The former minister, who had been deprived for not praying for the king and queen, opened a meeting-house, and nearly all the families in the parish sympathized with him and attended his ministry. The newly appointed minister, therefore, could not get many hearers, nor could he hold a kirk session, nor administer the Lord's Supper with decency, and at length, during the rebellion in October, 1715, he was stopped on the way to church by the army, and had to flee for safety. He subsequently returned when order was restored, the former incumbent having left the parish; the people gathered round him, and, by prudence and patience, he won their confidence and became to them a useful, efficient, and faithful minister. He died Jan. 27, 1730, aged about sixty-six years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 757, 758.

Clephane, Thomas (1), a Scotch clergyman, brother of the minister who was persecuted at Newtyle, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1693; was licensed to preach in 1702; appointed minister at Kingoldrum in 1704, and ordained; and died in April, 1712, aged about thirty-nine years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 753.

Clephane, Thomas (2), a Scotch clergyman, son of the minister at Newtyle, was born Dec. 28, 1700; licensed to preach in 1730, and the same year succeeded his father in the living at Newtyle; was ordained in 1731, and died Oct. 8, 1769, aged sixty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 758.

Clepper (or Clappe) was a wooden rattle, anciently used to summon the faithful to church on the three last days of Holy Week, when it was customary for the church bells to remain silent. Anthony à Wood, in his MS. Notes on the Oxfordshire Churches, mentions one that in his day remained at Thame, in that county, of which, however, no trace can be now discovered.

Cler, Saint. See CLAIR.

Clerc, Christian le, a famous French missionary, who spent twelve years (from 1675 to 1687) in Canada, is the author of Premier Etablissement de la Foi dans la Nouvelle France, etc. (Paris, 1691, 2 vols.):—Nouvelle Relation de la Gaspésie, etc. (1692). See Journal des Savants, 1691, 1692; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 846. (B. P.)

Clerc (or Klerck), Henri van, a Belgian historical painter, was born at Brussels in 1570, and probably studied under Van Balen. He painted several large works for the churches of the Low Countries. In the Church of St. James at Brussels there is a fine picture of The Crucifixion, and in the Church of Our Lady are two admirable pictures, representing The Holy Family and The Resurrection. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Clerc, Sebastien le, an eminent French designer and engraver, was born at Metz, in Lorraine, in 1657. The following are his best works: The Call of Abraham; The Prophet Elijah Sleeping; The Holy Family; The Stoning of Stephen; St. John in the Wilderness; The Annunciation; The Penitence of the Ninevites; The Adoration of the Magi. He died in 1714. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Clerici Acephali, a name given to vagrant clergymen in the Romish Church, or such ecclesiastics and monks as wander about from one district to another. In 850 the Council of Pavia issued an edict against them.

Clericis Laicos is the title of a bull issued by Boniface VIII in the year 1296, pronouncing all princes and nobles under ban who demanded tribute under any form from the Church and clergy, and placing under the same condemnation all who paid such tribute. This bull was aimed at Philip the Fair of France, who demanded that the clergy, in common with all other classes, should contribute money towards defraying the expenses of his wars.

Clericus, David, a Reformed theologian of Switzerland, was born at Geneva, Feb. 19, 1591. He studied in Germany, Holland, and England. After his return to his native place he was appointed, in 1619, professor of Oriental languages and history, and died in 1655. He wrote Questiones Sacre in Quibus Multa Scr. Luca Variæque Lingue S. Idiomata Explicantur (edited by J. Clericus, Amst. 1685). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 189; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Clerk, Alan, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1637; was presented to the living at Glenelg in 1641, but served Knoydart in 1642. The synod enjoined him in 1640 to attend synod twice a year. He continued in November, 1681, but the parish was vacant in 1689. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 101.

Clerk, Alexander (1), a Scotch clergyman, was appointed a reader in 1569; promoted to be an exhorter; presented to the living at Laggan in 1574, and died before Nov. 6, 1575. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 117.

Clerk, Alexander (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1646; was admitted to the living at Latheron in 1652; transferred to second charge at Inverness in 1663; promoted to the first charge in 1674, and died in September, 1693, aged about fifty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 253, 257, 363.

Clerk, Alexander (3), a Scotch clergyman, a native of Garioch, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1675; was admitted to the second charge at Old Machar prior to 1683; transferred to Methack the same year, and died before Feb. 9, 1703, aged forty-eight years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 487, 611.

Clerk, Andrew, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of Edinburgh in 1700; was licensed to preach in 1712; appointed to the living at Tundergarth in 1717, and ordained; and died June 6, 1754, aged seventy-three years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 662.

Clerk, Archibald, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1835; presented to the living at Aucharacle in 1837, and ordained; transferred to Dun-nish in 1839, and admitted in 1840; to Ardnamurchan in 1841, and to Kilmalie in 1844. There is no further record of him. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 83.

Clerk, David, a Scotch clergyman, was presented to the living at Maxton in 1770, and ordained, and died Jan. 13, 1776. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 557.

Clerk, Farquhard, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1626; was the first minister who visited Stornoway to establish a mission, the inhabitants being strangers to the gospel, and only a few under the age of forty having been baptized; was admitted in 1642, and continued in 1643. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 144.

Clerk, George, a Scotch clergyman, native of Buchan, studied at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1661; obtained license to preach in 1668; was admitted to the living at Logie-Durno (now Chapel-Garioch) prior to 1685, and was deposed in 1702 for negligence. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 575.

Clerk, Gilbert, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the Edinburgh University in 1646; was licensed to preach in 1652; admitted to the living at New Deer in 1654, amid very violent opposition, and continued in October, 1680. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 631.

Clerk, Jean, a French martyr, was born at Meaux, on the Marne. There he was arrested in 1523 for putting upon the church door a paper against indulgences, in which he called the pope Antichrist; for this his sentence was that three successive days he should be whipped, and have a mark of infamy upon his forehead. Afterwards he went to Rosia, in Bray, and from thence removed to Metz, in Lorraine, where he broke the papal images which the people were about to worship, and being arrested, confessed the fact. He was brought before the judges, and his hand was cut off; then his nose was torn from his face; after that both his arms and paps were likewise plucked out. His mutilated body was then committed to the fire and consumed, in 1524. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 361.

Clerk (or Clerke), John (1), D.D., an English prelate, was made dean of Windsor in 1519, and promoted to the see of Bath and Wells March 23, 1523. He died Jan. 3, 1541. He presented to Leo X the treatise of Henry VIII against Luther, under the title Oratio ad Leonem X in Exhibitione Libelli Regii Henrici VIII Contra Lutherum; cum Papæ Responsione, etc. (Lond. 1521). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Clerk, John (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1595; was licensed to preach the same year; called to the living at Monzie in 1599, and continued there in 1608. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 773, 774.

Clerk, John (3), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1586; was appointed to the living at Forteviot in 1591; transferred to Monzie about 1592, and to Auchterarder in 1593, where he continued in 1599. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 640, 746, 798.

Clerk, Pierre, a French martyr, did much good in reforming the Church in Meaux, of which he was afterwards chosen pastor. He began preaching to twenty persons, but his congregation soon grew to three hundred. As soon as the priests of Paris heard of their doings they sent to Meaux, and took them by force to Paris, sixty-two men and women being bound and marched the whole way. They, however, sang psalms continually, to the disgust of their adversaries. Chief among these captives was Pierre Clerk, who, with the rest, was racked, and then burned at Meaux in 1546. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 431.

Clerk, William (1), a Scotch clergyman, was appointed to the living at Anstruther in 1565 as the first minister of the Protestant religion; in 1567 Kilrynnie was also in his charge, and in 1574 Abercrumby was added. He died in February, 1583. He was a man of most happy memory for godliness, wisdom, and love of his flock, the light and life of his parish, and beloved of all sorts of persons. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 406.

Clerk, William (2), a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1595; was presented as the first Protestant minister at Cavers in 1599, admitted in 1601, transferred to Wilton in 1602, and died before April 30, 1641. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, i, 489, 516.

Clerk-ales is a name for a feast in which, when the clerk's wages were small, the richer parishioners sent in provisions for a banquet.

Clerk of the Closet is the title of the confessor to the sovereign, whose office it is to attend during divine service, to resolve all doubts respecting spiritual matters, and to wait in the private oratory or closet, where the chaplains in turn say prayers.

Clerks of the Vestry (or Vestibule) were men in charge of the sacristy, with the furniture for high-mass, and the copes. At Durham they slept at night over the west end of the vestry, and, with two others, acted as bell-ringers. The latter slept in a chamber opposite the sacristan's office in the north alley. There were three clerks of the vestibule at York.

Clermont, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Cluromontanum). Of these there were two, which are sometimes also called Councils of Auvergne, because they were held somewhere in that French province. They were provincial in their jurisdiction. See GALLICAN COUNCILS.

1. Held on Nov. 8, 535; Honoratus, archbishop of Bourges, presiding over fourteen other bishops. Sixteen canons were published.

2. Deprives of communion those who endeavor to get themselves appointed to bishoprics by the influence of persons in high station, or by artifice or bribery; and declares that those persons shall be consecrated who have been duly elected by the clergy and people, with consent of the metropolitan.

3. Forbids to lend the ornaments of the Church upon occasion of wedding festivities, and the like.

15. Directs that the priests who serve chapels in the country shall come together to celebrate the principal festivals with their bishop.

See Labbe, Concil. iv, 1803.

II. Held in November, 1095, by pope Urban II, at the head of thirteen archbishops, two hundred and five bishops and abbots. Here the crusade was determined upon. Philip I, king of France, who had deserted his lawful wife, and married Bertrade, was a second time excommunicated. The "Trêve de Dieu" was confirmed, as was the primacy of Lyons; the archbishop of Tours, also, in this council recovered his jurisdiction over Bretagne, and the bishop of Dol, who had the title of archbishop, was compelled to submit to the archbishop of Tours. Lastly, thirty-two canons were published.

1. Declares the days upon which the "Trêve de Dieu" shall be kept, and orders that it shall be observed towards the clergy, monks, and women.

2. Declares that the pilgrimage to deliver Jerusalem, undertaken from motives of piety, supplies the place of every other penance.

5. Forbids to appoint laymen, or any one under the order of subdeacon, to bishoprics.

6. Forbids the purchase of a benefice of any kind by any person for himself or another; orders that benefices so purchased shall lapse to the bishop to dispose of.

8. Forbids the exaction of any fee for burials.

10. Forbids any women, save those permitted by former canons, to dwell in the same house with a clergyman.

11. Forbids the ordination of illegitimates.

12 and 14. Forbid pluralities.

15 and 16. Forbid the clergy to receive any ecclesiastical preferment at the hand of a layman, and kings, etc., to make any such investiture.

18. Forbids the laity to have chaplains independent of the bishop.

23. Forbids to eat flesh from Ash Wednesday to Easter.

24. Directs that holy orders shall be conferred only in the Ember seasons and on Quadragesima Sunday.

28. Directs that all who communicate shall receive the body and blood of Christ under both kinds, unless there be necessity to the contrary.

29 and 30. Accord the same safety to those who, when pursued by their enemies, take refuge by a cross, as if in the Church itself.

32. Devotes to eternal infamy those who arrest or throw into prison a bishop.

Of all the acts of this council the most celebrated is the publication of the crusade to recover the Holy Land. This project was conceived by Gregory VII; and Urban, yielding to the earnest entreaties of Peter the Hermit, put it into execution, declaring that all penitents who assumed the cross should be thenceforward absolved from all their sins, and freed from the duty of fasting, and every other penitential work, in consideration of the perils and fatigues they would have to encounter. Those who, having taken the cross, failed to fulfil their vow, were excommunicated. See Labbe, Concil. x, 506. See CRUSADES.

Clermont (TONNERRE), Anne Antoine Jules de, a French prelate, second son of duke Jules Charles Henri, was born in Paris, Jan. 1, 1749. After having studied at the Sorbonne, he was made doctor of that school. He was nominated grand-vicar of Besançon, and shortly afterwards became bishop of Châlons (1782). As a deputy of the principal states, he protested against the decree relating to the clergy, and in 1792 published a letter on the subject, and then retired to Germany. After the concordat he returned to France, in 1820 became archbishop of Toulouse, and in December, 1822, cardinal. In 1823 he published, from Rome, a pastoral letter, attacking the liberty of the Gallican Church, but it was suppressed by a royal decree. He continued, however, his opposition. Charles X interfered, and notified the prelate that he must retire to his diocese. Finally the cardinal ceased his agitation, by the counsel of the holy see. In 1829, notwithstanding his age, he went to the conclave, and contributed to the election of Pius VIII. On his journey he suffered a fall, in consequence of which he died at Toulouse, Feb. 21, 1830. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clermont (TONNERRE), François de (1), bishop of Noyon and peer of France, was born in 1629; studied with the Jesuits at Paris; was made doctor by the Sorbonne; preacher to the court, and bishop in 1661. He was received in 1694 as a member of the Academy of France, where he founded a prize for poetry. He died at Paris, Feb. 5, 1701. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Clermont (TONNERRE), François de (2), bishop and duke of Langres, nephew of the preceding, was made bishop in 1696, and charged with the funeral sermon of Philip of France, duke of Orleans and brother of Louis XIV. He died March 12, 1724. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Cleromancy (from κληρος, a lot, and μαντεία, divination) is a method of divination by lot, in use among the ancient Greeks and Romans. It was generally performed by casting beans, pebbles, dice, or small bits of various substances into an urn, and drawing them out. By the particular marks on the pieces drawn the diviners were enabled to form their conclusions. Among the Germans (see Tacitus, De Germania), this kind of divination was practiced by casting small pieces of the twigs of fruit-trees, previously marked, on a white garment, and on removing them the marks were interpreted. After the introduction of Christianity similar practices were continued by using the Bible, opened at random, the passage which first met the eye being regarded as the solution of the difficulty. The custom, however, was condemned by various councils. See DIVINATION.

Clerus (or Clericus). See CLERGY.

Clerus, a deacon and a martyr at Antioch, is commemorated Jan. 7 in the old Roman and Usuard's martyrologies.

Cless, David Friedrich von, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 13, 1768, at Calw. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1796 deacon at Heidenheim, in 1799 at Göppingen, and in 1807 at Schorndorf. In 1810 he was appointed dean and pastor at Reutlingen, after having been ennobled the previous year, and died Aug. 10, 1810. He published Versuch einer Kirchlich-politischen Landes- und Culturgeschichte von Württemberg bis zur Reformation (Tübingen, 1807). See Döring, Die Gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 257. (B. P.)

Cless, David Jonathan, a German theologian, father of the preceding, was born Aug. 20, 1731, at Rommelshausen. He studied at Tübingen, was in 1761 deacon at Calw, in 1782 dean at Wildberg, and in 1790 at Göppingen, and died March 6, 1803. He wrote, Diss. de eo, quod Justum est Circa Revelanda vel Retinenda Delicta Occulta, Etiam Atrocia (Tübingen, 1754): — Versuch über den Neutestamentlichen Begriff des Glaubens (ibid. 1778). See Döring, Die Gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 258; Wiener, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 444. (B. P.)

Cless, Valentin, a German theologian, who flourished early in the 17th century, wrote Nicod. Frischlini Operum Poeticorum Paralipomena (Gera, 1607, 8vo): — Weck- und Betpöcklein in Kriegsgefahr (Leips. 1622). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cleta, in Greek mythology, was one of the two ancient graces, whom alone the Greeks at first knew; the other was called Phaëna.

Cléty, a French Benedictine theologian, lived in the former part of the 18th century. He was librarian of the Abbey of Saint-Bertin, and wrote, anonymously, Dissertation Historique et Critique sur l'Abbaye de Saint-Bertin et sur l'Eglise de Saint-Omer (Paris, 1737, 12mo): — Réponse aux Observations Générales sur l'Ecrit Intitulé (1737). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cleveland, Aaron, a Protestant Episcopal minister, was born at Cambridge, Mass., Oct. 19, 1715. He graduated from Harvard College in 1735, and in July, 1739, was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Haddam, Conn., from which he was dismissed in 1746, partly because of the deficiency in his support, and partly because some were offended with the fervency of his preaching. In 1747 he accepted a call from the South Precinct Congregational Church in Malden, Mass., and remained there about three and a half years. In 1750 he took charge of a small Congregational Church in Halifax, N. S. In consequence of a change in his theological views, he resigned his charge and sailed for Boston in 1754. Shortly afterwards he went to England, was ordained by the bishop of London in 1755, and was sent by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts to Sussex County, Del. The vessel in which he sailed was wrecked upon Nantucket shoals, and he was detained by personal injuries for some time at Norwich, Conn. On reaching Lewes, Del., he found his parish so feeble that the society, in 1757, transferred him to the vacant parish at New Castle, but he died on the way, Aug. 11, 1757. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 164.

Cleveland, Charles, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born at Guilford, Conn., June 26, 1804. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1824; studied theology at Andover, Mass., and at Princeton, N. J., completing his studies at Alexandria, Va.; was ordained deacon in 1829, and presbyter in 1837. Physical infirmity prevented him fulfilling his purpose of going as a missionary to the Africans; but he went to Washington, D. C., where he formed an African educational society. So much opposition was developed against the project that he finally abandoned it, and became rector of Trinity Church, Shelburne, Vt., in 1840. remaining there until 1848. Afterwards he was rector of St. John's Church, Ashfield, Mass., whence he was called to Trinity Church, East New York, L. I. He died there, Dec. 19, 1865. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. Oct. 1866, p. 485.

Cleveland, J. H., a Universalist minister, was a native of Kentucky. His ministry seems to have been confined to south-eastern Indiana, where he was considered a noble-hearted, zealous, talented minister. He entered the Union army, and was killed in the battle of Vicksburg, May 19, 1863. See Universalist Register, 1864, p. 21.

Cleveland, Nathaniel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, united with the Illinois Conference in 1841, and labored faithfully until his death, in 1850 or 1851. He was an ordinary preacher, but remarkably attentive to all his duties, and true to Church discipline. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1851, p. 673.

Cleveland, Newland, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of Pennsylvania. He experienced conversion when a lad; felt impressed to preach; sought earnestly for better intellectual preparation, but failed, became discouraged, and gave up his religion. He was reclaimed afterwards by the Wesleys, and labored in the ministry with them about four years. In 1859 he was admitted into the Michigan Conference. After preaching a little over two years he resigned his charge for a lieutenantancy in the 12th Michigan Regiment of infantry. He died in 1862. Mr. Cleveland was full of faith and good works; an earnest and successful minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 206.

Cleveland, Richard Falley, a Congregational minister, was born at Norwich, Conn., June 19, 1804. He graduated at Yale College in 1824, and studied theology for a time at Princeton. was ordained at Windham, Conn., in 1829, and served there three years; afterwards at Portsmouth, Va.; Caldwell, N. Y.; Fayetteville, and Holland Patent, where he died, Oct. 1, 1853. Mr. Cleveland was for three years secretary of the central agency of the American Home Missionary Society, and was a frequent contributor to periodicals. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 264.

Cleverley, Asa P., a Universalist minister, was born at North Weymouth, Mass., March 22, 1807. He received a private preparation for the ministry, and also studied at Phillips' Academy, Andover, and in 1834 was ordained. His successive fields of labor were Provincetown and Chatham, Mass., Nashua and New Ipswich, N. H., and Boston, Canton, Chelsea, and North Bridgewater, Mass. He died in Boston, July 22, 1871. Mr. Cleverley was an excellent man, diffident and unpretending. See Universalist Register, 1872, p. 149.

Clichtove (or Clichthouse), Jossy (Lat. Jodocus Clichtoveus), a Flemish theologian, was born at Nieuport. He commenced his studies at Louvain, and finished them at Paris in the College of Cardinal Lemoine, under Jacques Lefevre d'Étaples. He taught philosophy, at the College of Navarre, was admitted doctor in 1506, and appointed canon of theology at Chartres. He was one of the first men who wrote against Luther, doing so with sharpness, but without bitterness, and in pure Latin. He died at Chartres, Sept. 22, 1543. His principal works are, Anti Lutherus (Paris, 1523; Cologne, 1525):—Propugnaculum Ecclesiæ (Paris, 1526):—De Bello et Pace (ibid. 1523, 8vo):—Introductio in Artium Divisionem (ibid. 1526):—De Sacramento Eucharistiæ (ibid. eod.):—Elucidarium Ecclesiasticum:—Improbatio Articulorum Mart. Lutheri Veritate Catholica Dissidentium:—Supplementum Commentariorum Cyrilli Alex. ad Evangelium S. Joannis:—Comm. in Jo. Damasceni Libros de Orthodora Fide. See Winer, *Handbuch der theol. Clichy, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Clippiancense), near Paris; provincial: (1) Summoned by Lothaire II, in 628, but nothing more is known of it; (2) Held A.D. 633, in the presence of Dagobert, respecting the sanctuary of St. Denis; (3) Held in 636; (4) Held A.D. 659, in which the king confirmed certain privileges to St. Denis.

Clidsdail, GEORGE, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1600; was licensed to preach in 1602; presented to the living at Glasford in 1607, and died in January, 1627, aged about fifty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 284.

Clidsdale, JAMES, a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1738; became chaplain to the earl of Lauderdale; was called to the living at Kilconquhar in 1739, and ordained. He died March 13, 1759, aged forty-six years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, ii, 438.

Cliffe, WILLIAM, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of England. He was a local preacher in the Primitive Methodist Church; came to America in 1840; joined the Methodist Episcopal Church soon after his arrival, and in 1843 entered the Illinois Conference, in which he served the Church as an efficient minister twenty-three years, eight of them as presiding elder. He died suddenly, Sept. 17, 1866. Mr. Cliffe was a good preacher, and a Christian gentleman. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 219.

Clifford, ZELOTES S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1815. He removed westward with his parents in his childhood; received a very limited education; experienced conversion in 1840, and in 1843 entered the Indiana Conference. In 1860 he was transferred to the Southern Illinois Conference. He joined the 29th Regiment of Illinois Volunteers in 1861, and was appointed chaplain, in which capacity he labored three years. In 1865 he again entered the effective ranks, labored four years, then became superannuated, and died Oct. 23, 1872. Mr. Clifford was a man of fine personal appearance, an able minister, and a true friend. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 137.

Clift, ZENAS, an English Baptist minister, fourth son of Rev. William Clift, was born near Westbury, Wiltshire, Feb. 2, 1783. In 1809 he received a license from the Church of which he was a member, to preach in the villages near his home. He became pastor of the Church at Crockerton, Wilts, and for twenty years walked five miles regularly to his place of worship every Sabbath. He died Dec. 20, 1862. See (Lond.) Baptist Hand-book, 1864, p. 118. (J. C. S.)

Climent, JOSEF, a Spanish prelate, was born March 21, 1706, at Castellon de la Plana, Valencia. He studied in his native town, and was made doctor of theology there. Immediately afterwards he was appointed successively professor of philosophy at the university, curate and theologian of the cathedral, and in 1766 was called to the bishopric of Barcelona. Having become the object of royal jealousy, he resigned in 1775, and died in his native town, Nov. 25, 1781. He translated into Spanish Fleury's Mœurs des Israélites et des Chrétiens, and published also Instructions on Marriage, written by Le Tourneur, and translated by the countess de Montijo, etc. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Climie, JOHN, a Canadian Congregational minister, was born at Cambuslang, near Glasgow, Feb. 19, 1807. He emigrated to Dalhousie, Ontario, in 1820; and in 1833 removed to Innisfil, near Lake Simcoe, where he was converted, and devoted himself to the ministry. He preached successively at Innisfil, two years at Scotch Corners, and thirteen years at Bowmanville; resigned the ministry in 1855, established a printing-office, and started the Canadian Statesman. In 1857 Mr. Climie removed to Belleville, where he died, Aug. 5, 1867. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1868, p. 262.

Clinchamp, Gervais Gianolet de, a French prelate, born in the early part of the 13th century, of noble parentage. Having been by turns archdeacon of Mans, canon and dean of Notre-Dame, at Paris, he was made cardinal, with the title of St. Silvestre, and of St. Martin des Montagnes, April 12, 1281. He died at Rome of the plague in 1287, leaving two letters, of which one was printed in the Speculum Carmelitanum, i, 89, and the other in the Bullarium Carmelitanum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cline, David, a Lutheran minister, was connected with the synod of New York and New Jersey, for thirteen years was pastor of the Lutheran Church at Spruce Run, N. J., and died there Nov. 5, 1877. See Lutheran Observer, Nov. 23, 1877.

Clinet, Nicolas, a French martyr, was a schoolmaster at Saintonge, and an elder of the Church in Paris. He was suspected by the judges of being a minister, and therefore was set to dispute with Dr. Maillard, of the Sorbonne. He was turned at Paris in 1558. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 431.

Cling, Conrad, a Franciscan monk of Germany, and preacher at Erfurt, where he died, March 10, 1556, is remarkable as being the only priest who kept up the religious services of his Church at a time when the Romish churches were deserted and the people eagerly listened to evangelical truth, as preached by the Reformers and their disciples. He wrote, De Securitate Catholicorum Conscientiæ in Rebus Fidei:—Confutatio Mendaciorum a Lutheranis Adversus Librum Imperii seu Interim Editorum:—Loci Communes Theologici pro Ecclesia Catholica:—Summa Doctrinæ Christianæ Catholica. See Molschmann, Erfordia Litterata; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Clinton, George H., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in St. Helena Parish, La., Jan. 7, 1835. He was converted at the family altar in his fourteenth year; graduated with honors at Centenary College, Jackson, La., in 1863, and in the following year entered the Mississippi Conference. In 1868 he was transferred to the St. Louis Conference, but early in 1870 was obliged to become a superannuate, and retired to Darlington, La., where he died, Dec. 29, 1870. Mr. Clinton was social and genial, honest and humble, entertaining and successful, energetic and devout. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1871, p. 599.

Clinton, Isaac, a Congregational minister, was born at West Milford, near Bridgeport, Conn., Jan. 21, 1759, and served in the revolutionary war. He graduated from Yale College in 1780; studied divinity with a private teacher; was ordained, and installed at Southwick, Mass., Jan. 30, 1788. In 1807 he removed to Lowville, N. Y., as pastor and first principal of the academy, continuing the former relation for ten years. He died there March 18, 1840. While in Southwick he published a work on Infant Baptism, and in his eightieth year he prepared and published a work on a kindred subject. See Presbyterianism in Central N. Y. p. 500; Hough, Amer. Biog. Notes, p. 79.

Clinton, Osceola, a colored Methodist Episcopal minister, was born a slave about 1844. He professed religion in early life, labored some time as local preacher, and in 1871 was admitted into the Alabama Conference. He served the Church faithfully until his death, March 30, 1873. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 143.

Clinton, Thomas, a pioneer preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born of Irish parents in Philadelphia, Pa., in January, 1793. He was left an orphan in infancy, but received a careful bringing up in the family of a generous Methodist. In 1800 he removed with his guardian to Charleston, S. C., where he was apprenticed to a brick-mason. In 1808 he was converted, and after spending some time as exhorter and local preacher, he, in 1820, united with the South Carolina Conference, and was sent to the missions on the Mississippi. Of the fifty-six years of his ministerial life, eighteen were spent on circuits, five on colored missions, four on districts, and twenty-nine as a superannuate. He died in St. Helena Parish, La., Oct. 28, 1875. Mr. Clinton was small in person; possessed a clear, full, manly voice; was a close student, and one of the foremost theologians of his conference. In his private life he was very exact and highly exemplary. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1875, p. 201; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Clio, in Greek mythology, is the muse of history, the daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, and, by Pierus, the mother of Hyacinthus. She is represented as sitting on an ancient chair, her head crowned with laurels, richly dressed. At her feet there stands an open box with rolls of books, and one in her left hand bears the inscription ΚΑΕΙΩ ΙΣΤΟΡΙΑΝ.

Clipston, John, an English Carmelite theologian, died in 1378, leaving Expositorum Sacrorum Bibliorum:—Exempla Sacra Scriptura:—Quæstiones in Magistrum Sententiarum:—Sermones. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clissold, Henry, A.M., a Church of England divine, was born in 1796. He graduated from Exeter College, Oxford, in 1818, and in 1830 was presented by Lord Lyndhurst to the rectory of Chelmondiston, Suffolk, which benefice he held twenty-eight years. Part of the time, in connection with this, he was also, for thirty-three years, minister of Stockwell Chapel, Lambeth. Mr. Clissold was best known, however, as one of the leaders of the evangelical party in the Church, and as an author of several excellent religious works of a practical character. He died in London, Jan. 1, 1867. See Appleton's Annual Cyclop. 1867, p. 587.

Clitæus, king of Brecknock about A.D. 482, was the son of Citguin. The story is, that as he had resolved upon remaining unmarried, and as he was nevertheless beloved by a noble maiden who rejected all other suitors for his sake, one of the courtiers who aspired to her hand was instigated to murder him. He is commemorated as a martyr Aug. 19. See Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 818.

Cloāca is a name applied by Gregory the Great to the baptismal font. See BAPTISTRY.

Cloake, John W., an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Pilaton, Cornwall. He entered the ministry in 1808, and labored for thirty-one years, until obliged by paralysis to retire. He died Aug. 7, 1846, aged sixty-seven. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1846.

Clochier is a French name for a detached campanile. At St. Paul's, London, it contained the mote bell.

which summoned the citizens to folk-motes, or muster of arms, on their parade ground.

Clock. A mechanical clock was made by Peter de Chalus at Clugny, in the middle of the 14th century. A contemporaneous clock, with automata to strike the hours, formerly at Glastonbury, is now preserved at Wells. In the 14th century abbot Wallingford gave an astronomical clock to St. Alban's, and in 1324 T. de Louth, treasurer, presented to Lincoln a clock "as was common in cathedrals and the greater conventual churches." At Padua, Bologna, and Paris, church clocks are mentioned of the same date. At Dijon, Wells, and Strasburg, there are curious processions of little moving figures occurring at the hours, which are struck also by automata. The invention of clocks with a wheel and escapement is attributed variously to Pacificus, a deacon of Verona, in the 9th century, and to Gerbert of Rheims, subsequently pope Sylvester II, who died in 1003. Clocks to mark the hours in choir for commencing divine service remain at Toledo, with automata; at Rheims, in the north wing of the transept; at Westminster, in the south wing, near the vestry; and at Beauvais, in the north choir aisle. There is also a mechanical clock of 1508 at Lyons. The choir bell, or nota, was formerly hung at the entrance of the choir for the purpose, mentioned by Durandus, of giving due warning, and then the great campana in the belfry and the signa of the tower sounded the summons to the faithful. The choir bell inside the church is also mentioned by Reginald of Durham.

Clodius, David, a Lutheran theologian and philologist of Germany, who was born in Hamburg, became professor of Oriental languages at Giessen in 1671, afterwards professor of theology and preacher, and died there Sept. 10, 1687, is the author of Grammatica Linguae Ebraeae (Giessen, 1684); — De Ritibus Precandi Vett. Ebraeorum (ibid. 1674); — An Speranda Superstitionis Insignis Aliqua Judaeorum Conversio (ibid. 1683). He also edited a Hebrew Bible with various readings (1677); — Lud. de Dieu's Gramm. Linguarum Orientalium, and Hanneken's Tubula Synopt. Gram. et Rudd. Hebr. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 181; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Steinschneider, Bibliog. Handbuch, p. 37. (B. P.)

Clodius, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Neustadt, Aug. 15, 1645. He studied at Wittenberg; was, in 1672, adjunctus to the philosophical faculty; in 1675 provost and superintendent at Sieben; in 1683 doctor of theology; in 1690 superintendent at Grossenhayn, and died June 14, 1733. He wrote, Disputat. de Significatione Cameli ad Matth. xix. 24; — De Spiritibus Familiaribus; — De Transmutatione Dei et Vossitatione Hominis; — Schola Philologica de Capitulis Romanorum Veterum; — De Magia Sagittarum Nabuchodonosoris, etc. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, *Nouv. Cloffan, an early Welsh saint, was patron of Llan-gloffan, in Pembrokeshire. See Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 307.

Cloggie, WILLIAM, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Edinburgh University in 1603; was appointed to the second charge at Elgin in 1607; transferred to Inveravon in 1608; to Inverness in 1620, and retained the revenues till the synod of 1624 compelled his dismissal. He removed, but in 1640 a complaint was lodged against him, and, considering himself ill-used, he resigned, and settled at Spynie in 1647. He died Dec. 28, 1659, aged about seventy-seven years, leaving a son, Alexander, who received a nominal chaplaincy from James VI in 1618. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticae, iii, 153, 172, 221, 253.

Cloiseault, CHARLES EDMÉ, a French theologian, was born at Clamecy. He joined, in 1664, the Congregation of the Oratory, and became principal of the seminary and grand vicar of Châlon-sur-Saône, where he died. Nov. 3, 1728, leaving Vie de Saint Charles Borromeo, transl. from the Italian of Guissano (Lyons, 1685, 4to); — Vie de François de Saint-Pré (1696, 12mo); — Méditations des Prêtres Devant et Après la Messe (Lyons, 1723, 12mo); — Méditations d'une Retraite Ecclésiastique (ibid. 12mo), with some other works which were not published. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cloissonné is a French term for the older method of enamelling, where the hollows in the ground were made by thin strips of metal soldered on to it.

Cloister. (Clastrum, an enclosure; Germ. Kreuzgang.) We give additional details on this subject:

"It was known as the laurel court at Peterborough: the palm court, as connected with the ceremonial of Palm Sunday, at Wells; and the Spyre at Chester, a corruption of Paradise, as it was called at Chichester and Winchester, having been either filled with earth from the Holy Land, or, more probably, because it was the Lord's garden, sown with the seeds of the resurrection 'harvest.' The enclosed portion of the forecourt of the basilica was also called the paradise, and from the surrounding porticoes the cloister took its origin. Each alley of the quadrangle in a monastery was placed under the government of the obediens, or officer whose chequer or place of business adjoined it; it was considered to form part of the church. The usual arrangement was this: the refectory invariably on the side opposite or parallel to the minister; the dormitory on the east, or otherwise on the west; sometimes the latter site was occupied by the guest-house, or the bedchamber of the convents, or lay brothers; a large central space for air, light, and recreation was thus secured in the utmost privacy, while passages communicated with all the principal buildings. The alleys were allotted to various uses: that lying next the hall being forbidden to the brethren at most times. The western alley was occupied by the novices, and the northern alley by the monks in times of study; the eastern side was used at the manudy, and the usual Sabbatical, feet-washing. The abbot, or superior, sat next the east door of the cloister, near the entrance of the church.

In some monasteries, as Fontaine, Beaulieu, Jorevalle, Netley, Stoneleigh, Wroxhall, Kirkstall, and originally at St. Alban's, there were only, it would seem, alleys of timber-work, which have long since perished. Other cloisters, such as Durham and Peterborough, were enriched with a superb series of stained glass; and the fan-traceried vaulting at Gloucester is a marvel of the most elaborate stone-work.

"At night four lanterns were lighted at the four angles of the cloister, and one in front of the chapter-house door. A procession was daily made through its entire circuit. In the 8th century abbots were frequently buried in the centre of the garth.

"Many secular cathedrals, as three in Wales, Lichfield, and York, and most collegiate churches, as Southwell, Ripon, and Manchester, were unprovided with cloisters. In many foreign minsters, as Maulbronn, Pay, Münster, Caen, Pontigny, Puy-en-Velay, Braga, Batalha, Sigüenza, Leon, Toledo, Gerona, Huesca, Mayence, and Toulonze, the cloisters were on the north side, to secure shade in a hot climate, or rather, perhaps, for water-supply and drainage, as at Sherborne, Canterbury, Gloucester, Chester, Magdalen College (Oxford), Cartmel, St. Mary Overy, St. David's, Tintern, Malinesbury, Milton Abbas, Moynes, Muckross, Adare, Kilmallock, and the Dominican churches of Paris, Agen, and Toulonze. In some other churches they occupied an abnormal position, on the north of the choir at Tarragona and Lincoln, and southward of it at Burgos, Rochester, and Chichester; and at Lerida, Orléans, New College (Oxford), and Brantome on the west of the church. At Hereford there was a chantry of Our Lady's Arbour, over the vestibule of the chapter-house; and chapels, in the centre of the sward at Winchester College, Hildesheim, and Old St. Paul's, in which masses of requiem were sung for the repose of the souls of persons buried in the garth. The cloisters of Verona, Pisa, and Subiaco, of Zurich, Batalha, Beauport, Fontenelle, and Caen are among the finest foreign examples. At Bamberg there are two cloisters, one on the north and another on the south; at Tarragona and Ratisbon are two, on the north-east of the church; at Illdeheim the cloister is eastward of it. Sometimes the ordinary fourth alley of the quadrangle is wanting, as at Wells, Toni, Canigo, and Hereford. At Evesham there were, and at Norwich there still exist, rooms over the cloisters. The infirmary in England had often its separate cloister, as at Gloucester, Westminster, and Canterbury; and in foreign monasteries the subordinate cloister was allotted for the use of the copyists and communication with the lodgings of the conventual officers. At St. Paul's there was a two-storied cloister, enclosing the chapter-house. There is another instance at San Juan in Toledo. The Carthusians built round their cloister cells of solitary, containing three rooms, in one of which missa stecce might be celebrated; the certosans at Florence and Pavia still preserve the arrangement, which, at the foundation of monasteries, was a necessity, as we find the monks at Battle living at first in little houses, and at Stoneleigh the Cistercians occupying 'dwelling-places of tents,' while at Fontaines the earliest brotherhood lodged under the yew-trees that grew upon the slopes. Marburg presents the remarkable type of two choirs, two rood-screens, two towers at each end, and two cloisters, one on the north and another on the south. "The Eastern monasteries have usually a large central space, round which is a colonnade communicating with the houses of the inmates. In Ireland, Spain, Italy, and France the windows were unglazed, resembling open arcades."

Clokie, ANDREW, a Scotch Independent minister, was born at Whitburn, Wigton, Scotland, March 12, 1833. He was educated at Glasgow University, and began his ministry in the service of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Glasgow. He labored in that city more than ten years, and then, after two years' retirement, engaged in Christian labor for the Congregational Church at Normanton, where he died, Aug. 24, 1872. See (Lond.) Comp. Year-book, 1873, p. 320.

Cloppenburgh, JOHANN EVERHARD, a Reformed theologian of Holland, was born at Amsterdam, May 13, 1592. He studied chiefly in Leyden, was in 1616 preacher at Aalborg, in 1618 at Heusden, in 1621 at Amsterdam, and in 1630 at Briel. In 1640 he was appointed professor and preacher at Harderwick, in 1644 professor of theology and university preacher at Franeker, and died in France, Aug. 30, 1654. He wrote: Sacrificiorum Patriarchalium Schola Sacra:—De die Comesti a Christo Agni Paschalis, Atque de Sabbatho Deuteropropto:—Syntagma Exercitationum Electarum, etc. His Theologica Opera Omnia were published at Amsterdam, 1684, 2 vols., and a second edition of his Syntagma, at Franeker, 1655. Clopton, ABNER WENTWORTH, a Baptist minister, was born in Virginia, March 24, 1784. After a partial course in a neighboring academy, he continued his studies in a private classical school, and finally graduated at the University of North Carolina, where he afterwards was a teacher for six years. He was licensed to preach in 1816, and in 1819 had calls to various places, but accepted one from Milton, N. C. In 1823 he joined the Appomattox Association, for which he furnished a circular letter on Church Discipline, and another on Ministerial Ordination, both highly creditable. He died March 4, 1833. Diligence, moral courage, and fervent devotion were distinguishing traits in his character. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 657.

Clorivière, PIERRE JOSEPH PICOT DE, a French theologian, was born in Bretagne about 1735. He was educated a Jesuit, but could not take the vow, as the society was suppressed in 1762 by the parliament of Bretagne. Clorivière was appointed pastor of Paramé, near St. Malo, and continuing relations with the Jesuits and the royalist party, he was imprisoned by Napoleon I, in the Temple, for several years. On the return of the Bourbon family he was set at liberty, and eagerly labored for the reunion of the Jesuitical order. He died Jan. 5, 1820, leaving, Vie de Grignon de Montfort (St. Malo, 1785, 12mo):—Exercice de Dévotion à Saint- Louis de Gonzague, transl. from the Italian of Galpin (1785, 12mo):—Considérations sur l'Exercice de la Prière, et de l'Oraison (1802, 12mo):—Explication des Epîtres de Saint-Pierre (1809, 3 vols. 12mo). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Close is a name for the enclosure of a cathedral, surrounded by a wall, and bordered by the houses of the dignitaries, canons, and minor members of the foundation. In the 14th century, Wells, Lichfield, Lincoln, and Exeter were enclosed with walls; and in the following century St. David's (Hereford) and St. Paul's, owing to the acts of violence perpetrated within the precinct by robbers, and the danger accruing to the canons on their way to church. In the 12th century the canons in English cathedrals had their separate houses, and the dignitaries possessed oratories attached to them. The close included also a chapter-house, library, school, vicars' college, and, in some instances, a cloister, as at Hereford, Chichester, Wells, Salisbury, St. Paul's, St. David's, Exeter, and Lincoln. Large gate-houses at various points gave access to the precinct. At Bury St. Edmund's the precinct, in the 10th century, was marked by four crosses, at the four cardinal points of the abbey jurisdiction. Some of the ancient houses remain at Chichester, Exeter, Wells, and Bayeux. Markets, fairs, and every kind of traffic were forbidden in the close, which usually extended to a distance of one hundred and eighty feet on each side of the church. The well-kept close is peculiar to England.

Close, FRANCIS, D.D., an Anglican prelate, youngest son of the Rev. Henry Jackson Close, sometime rector of Bentworth, near Alton, Hampshire, England, was born in 1797, and his early education was received from the Rev. Dr. Cherry, head master of Merchant Taylors' School, and the Rev. John Scott, the eldest son of the well-known commentator. He graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1820, and soon after became curate of Church Lawford, near Rugby. In 1822 he became curate of Willesden and Kingsbury, Middlesex, and in 1824 went to Cheltenham as curate to the Rev. Charles Jervis. He succeeded the latter in 1826, and for thirty years devoted himself to his parochial duties at that place. His public advocacy of the present system of government education, chiefly arising out of his laborious efforts to establish the Training College for school masters and mistresses at Cheltenham, received the acknowledgments of successive governments. During Mr. Close's incumbency, the population of the place increased from 19,000 to 40,000, and he erected no fewer than five district churches, with schools, and contributed largely to the establishment of Cheltenham College. In 1856 he became dean of Carlisle, which position he resigned in August, 1881, on account of ill-health. At Carlisle he established a dispensary, and several schools and churches. He died Dec. 18, 1882. Dr. Close was author of many pamphlets, one of which, on the Choral Service, obtained a wide circulation. He was an earnest opponent of horse-racing, theatrical amusements, and the use of liquors and tobacco. See Men of the Time (10th ed.), s. v.

Close, Henry M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, entered the North Ohio Conference in 1851, and became a member of the Central Ohio Conference when it was organized. He labored therein with much acceptability and usefulness until 1866, when he became superannuated, retiring to his farm on Pioneer Circuit, Toledo District, where he performed what ministerial work his health would permit. He died in the latter part of 1880. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1881, p. 321.

Close, John (1), an English minister of the Society of Friends, was born in 1680, and united with the Friends against the wishes of his father. He travelled extensively as a preacher in his native country, and in Scotland, Holland, and Wales, and died at Alloway, Cumberland, Nov. 27, 1715. His care over the Church was great, his advice seasonable, his judgment sound. See Piety Promoted, ii, 115, 116. (J. C. S.)

Close, John (2), a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) and Presbyterian Churches, was born at Greenwich, Conn., in 1737. He graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1763, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Dutchess County, N. Y., in 1765; served the Presbyterian Church at Huntington, from 1766 to 1773; at New Windsor and Newburgh, from 1773 to 1796, and the Reformed Church at Waterford and Middletown, from 1796 to 1804, and died in 1815 (or 1813). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 43; Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 212.

Close (or Cloos), Nicholas, an English prelate, was born at Bibbreke, Westmoreland, and was one of the six original fellows whom Henry VI placed in his newly erected King's College, Cambridge. In fact, he committed the building of the house to Close's fidelity, who right honestly discharged his trust. He was bishop of Carlisle (1450), then of Lichfield, where he died shortly after his consecration, in Oct., 1452. See Fuller, Worthies of England (ed. Nuttall), iii, 304.

Close, Titus, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Ilanley, in the Potteries, June 10, 1795. His youth was that of a vagabond in the literal and moral sense; but in 1815 he was deeply convicted under Methodist preaching, and was converted at St. Austell. He soon commenced preaching, and on Nov. 2, 1819, embarked as a missionary to India. He labored at Madras, visiting other points, until failing health compelled him to return home. In England he worked in the pastorate until his constitution utterly broke down. He died at Croft, near Darlington, June 10, 1833. He was "a willing servant of the Lord and the Church." See Minutes of the British Conference, 1833; Wesleyan Meth. Magazine, 1835, p. 401 sq.

Clotaire II, son of Chilperic I and Fredegund, succeeded his father in 584, but only in Chilperic's original kingdom of Soissons. Clotaire, after many family strifes, became sole king of the Franks in 613. At an assembly in Paris, in 614, Clotaire issued an edict, which, among other provisions, decreed that election of bishops was to be by clergy and people (a clero et populo), with right of confirmation in the king, and reserving also a right of direct nomination to the king (c. 1). No bishop was to elect his own successor (c. 2). The clergy were only in special cases to be subject to the civil courts (c. 4). In disputes between the clergy and civilians, the cause was to be adjudged by a mixed tribunal (c. 5). Liberty of appeal was granted against oppressive taxation (c. 9); also liberty to relations of intestates to inherit (c. 6). In local administration natives of the locality alone were to be employed (c. 12). Finally, there was a clause that neither freeman nor slave, unless a thief caught in the act, should be condemned to death without a hearing. Clotaire died in 628, and was succeeded by his son, Dagobert.

Cloterius (or Clotterius), ANASTASIUS, a German theologian of the latter part of the 17th century, entered the Capuchin order of the Minors of St. Francis as a preacher, and became master of the novices, and guardian and definitor of the Roman province. He wrote, Thymiana Derotionis (Cologne, 1674):—De Sacris Ritibus (ibid, 1688). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clothier, CHARLES E., a Baptist minister, was born in 1820. Being converted in early manhood, he united with Calvary Church, Philadelphia, and, when the Bethel was organized, entered zealously into the work among the sailors; he was elected chaplain of the 88th regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was ordained specially for that service. When the war was ended he returned to Philadelphia, and was elected deacon in the Church of which he was a member. About 1873 he removed to the northern part of the city, where he took an interest in Gethsemane Church. He died in Philadelphia, Dec. 5, 1881. "In all the relations of life he left the witness of a godly walk and conversation." See National Baptist, Dec. 15, 1881. (J. C. S.)

Clotho, in Greek mythology, was the youngest of the Fates, or Parcæ (q. v.). It was her office to spin the thread between her fingers, that is, to give life and continue it. She was represented holding the spindle, dressed in a long gown of several colors, and having on her head a crown with seven stars.

Clotilda (Chrotechildis, or Chrotildis), a French saint, daughter of Chilperic I and wife of Clovis, was born about 475. Although the daughter of an Arian, she was brought up a Catholic. According to Gregory of Tours, her uncle, Gundobald, gave her to Clovis (Chlodovicus) as a wife in 492 or 493. Clotilda baptized her first-born son, and took occasion to represent to Clovis the futility of the heathen worship. The child died soon after, and although Clovis believed that the Frankish gods were offended, yet he permitted the second child also to be baptized. It, too, sickened; but, notwithstanding the taunts of her husband, Clotilda prayed for it, and it recovered. Nor did she cease her entreaties until the conversion of Clovis. After Clovis's death, Clotilda lived principally at Tours. She was the real or reputed foundress of several religious houses, notably of St. Mary of Andelys, near Rouen, to which girls were sent for education from England in Bede's time. The original foundation was destroyed by the Normans. Clotilda, however, remained the patron saint of the place, and miracles were worked there in her name down to the Revolution, and have recommenced since. She died at Tours, June 3, 545, and was buried at Paris beside her husband, in the Church of the Apostles, afterwards St. Geneviève's. Her festival is on June 3. The only biography of any value is Sainte-Clotilde et son Siècle, by the abbé Rouquette (Paris, 1867). See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clotz, STEPHAN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Lippe, Sept. 13, 1606. He studied at different universities, was in 1629 archdiaconus of St. James at Rostock, in 1632 professor, and in 1635 doctor of theology there. In 1636 he was appointed general superintendent of Schleswig and Holstein, in 1639 provost and pastor at Flensburg, and died in 1668. He wrote, Pneumatica, sive Theologia Naturalis:—Tractatus de Angelolatria:—De Sudore Christi Sanguineo et Tristitia atque Cruciatibus Animæ Ejus:—De Satisfactione Christi:—De Baptismo:—Historia Magorum:—Commentaria et Annotationes in Epistolâ Pauli:—De Auctoritate et Perfectione Scripturæ Sacræ, etc. See Moller, Cimbria Litterata; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Cloud (Clodoaldus), Saint, a Frankish presbyter, was the youngest son of Clodomir, king of Orleans, and grandson of St. Clotilda. He was born A.D. 522, and in 524 his father was killed in Burgundy. The two elder brothers of Clodoaldus were killed by their uncles, kings Childebert and Clotaire, but Clodoaldus escaped by the help of some powerful nobles. Consecrating himself to God, he renounced the throne of Orleans. In 551, yielding to a popular demand, Eusebius, bishop of Paris, ordained him a priest. Clodoaldus settled at Nogent (Novigentum), where he died, Sept. 7, 560. His festival is on Sept. 7. See Patrol. Lat. cxxxix, 675; Le Cointe, Annales Eccles. Franc. (Paris, 1665) i, 327, 348, 370.

Cloud (Clodulphe, or Flondulphe), Saint, an early French prelate, was born in 597. He was the son of St. Arnoul and of the blessed Doda. He was educated at the court of the kings of Austrasia. St. Cloud married Ahmaberta, and had several children. He became minister of the state of Austrasia, and in 656 was elected by the people as successor of bishop Goda of Metz. The martyrology of Metz assigns his decease June 8, 656. His day is June 8. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Cloud, Newton, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Stokes County, N. C., Nov. 30, 1804. He was converted in Logan County, Ky., in 1823, and in 1853 entered the Illinois Conference. In 1868 he retired, and remained a superannuate until his death, July 22, 1877. For two or three terms Mr. Cloud was a member of the Illinois legislature. He was a Christian gentleman. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 134.

Cloud, Robert, a Methodist Episcopal preacher, began his ministry in 1785, and filled the following appointments: 1785, Trenton; 1786, Newark; 1787, Elizabethtown; 1788, Long Island; 1789 and 1790, New York; 1791 and 1792, presiding elder of the territory in and about New York city; 1793, Chester, and in 1794 located, after which no trace of his life remains. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1785-94; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 225; Stevens, Hist. of the M. E. Church, ii, 57.

Clouet (or Clowet), Albert, a Belgian engraver, nephew of Peter, was born at Antwerp in 1624, and studied under Cornelius Bloemaert. The following are his principal plates: The Miraculous Conception; The Battle of Joshua with the Amalekites. He resided a long time in Rome, and afterwards in Florence, and died at Antwerp in 1687. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clouet (or Clowet), Peter, a Belgian engraver, was born at Antwerp in 1606, and studied under Spierre and Bloemaert at Rome. The following are his principal works: The Descent from the Cross; The Virgin Suckling the Infant Jesus; St. Michael Discomfiting the Evil Spirit. He died at Antwerp in 1668. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clough, James, an English Methodist preacher, was born at Rochdale, Lancashire. He began to travel in 1760 in connection with the Wesleyan Conference, and, after laboring for about eleven years, he settled at Leicester, where he acted as a local preacher till his death in 1795. See Atmore, Meth. Memorial, s. v.

Clough, Philemon, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Springfield, Vt., May 18, 1818. He united with the Church at the age of sixteen, and was ordained at Grantham, Nov. 7, 1861. A part of his ministerial life was devoted to itinerant labors in Vermont. For three years and a half he was pastor of a Church in Weare, N. H. For the last six years of his life he did not preach much, on account of ill-health. He died at Grantham, June 19, 1878. His sermons were original rather than scholastic. See Morning Star, Sept. 4, 1878. (J. C. S.)

Clough, Simon, a distinguished minister of the Christian Connection, was born at Monmouth, Me., in 1793, and employed on his father's farm till nearly twenty years of age. In 1812 he sought an academic training; in 1814, experienced conversion. He continued his studies first at a private seminary in Winthrop, and subsequently at the academy in Hebron, where his application to the Greek and Latin was so intense that his eyesight failed him, and he was obliged to refrain from books for several years. He began to preach in 1817; was soon after ordained as an evangelist, and, having gathered several new churches between Kennebec and Penobscot rivers, supplied, during the winter of 1818-19, the pulpit of the Christian Society at Eastport. In the spring he visited Portland; thence removed to Boston, where he remained till 1824. In that year he went to New York, and established the first Christian Connection Church in that city. In 1833 he removed to Fall River, Mass., and in 1837 to the state of New Jersey, where his preaching was followed by remarkable success. He died May 20, 1844. Mr. Clough was distinguished for deep piety, strong mental powers, and great fidelity in the discharge of all his duties. He published A Series of Articles and Discourses, Doctrinal, Practical, and Experimental (N. Y. 1843, 8vo). See The Christian Examiner (Boston), 1847, p. 227.

Clough, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Bishopthorpe, near York, May 30, 1799. He was converted in his sixteenth year, entered the conference in 1823, and was stationed at Epworth. From 1824 to 1830 he labored on the islands of St. Kitt's, Nevis, Montserrat, and Antigua, W. I. He returned to England and occupied several circuits, until his death, Dec. 10, 1846. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1847.

Clouston, Charles, LL.D., a Scotch clergyman, studied at Edinburgh University; was licensed to preach in 1821, and ordained in 1826, as assistant to his father, whom he succeeded at Sandwick and Stromness in 1832. There is no record of his death. Dr. Clouston published, The Church in Orkney (1844):—Address to Orkney-men (1845):—Account of the Parish and Observations on the County; and wrote the account of Orkney in the Guide to the Highlands. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 403.

Clouston, William, a Scotch clergyman, was presented to the living at Cross and Burness in 1773; transferred to Sandwick and Stromness in 1793, and died Aug. 20, 1832, aged eighty-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scoticanæ, iii, 403, 411.

Clove-Gillyflower, or, carnation pink, a species of the Dianthus, archaically drawn, is frequently found in mediæval MSS., symbolizing the graces of the blessed Virgin Mary.

Clovesho (or Cliff's-hoe), COUNCILS OF (Concilium Cloveense). These were provincial, and the locality is unknown, except that it was in the kingdom of Mercia, and probably near London (Haddan and Stubbs, Counc. iii, 122). It was selected by the Council of Hertford, A.D. 673, as the place for the yearly synod of the English Church (ibid. 120), yet (singular to say) no Council of Clovesho was recorded until—

I. Held in 716, when the privilege of Wiltred of Kent to the churches of Kent was confirmed by a general synod of the English bishops, under Ethelbald, king of Mercia (Haddan and Stubbs, Counc. iii, 300-302).

II. Held in 742; Ethelbald, king of the Mercians, and Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, presiding. Several bishops attended, and diligent inquiry was made how matters relating to religion, and particularly to the creed, were ordered in the infancy of the Church of England, and in what esteem monasteries then were. The ordinance of king Wiltred, concerning the election and authority of the heads of monasteries, made in the Council of Becaneld, in 692, was read, and renewed by Ethelbald in these words:

"I, Ethelbald, king of the Mercians, for the health of my soul and the stability of my kingdom, and out of reverence to the venerable archbishop Cuthbert, confirm it by the subscription of my own magnificent hand, that the liberty, honor, authority, and security of the Church of Christ be contradicted by no man; but that she and all the lands belonging to her be free from all secular services, except military expedition, and the building of a bridge or castle. And we charge that this be irrefragably and immutably observed by all, as the aforesaid king Wiltred ordained for him and his."

See Labbe, Concil. iv, 1532; Wilkins, Concil. i, 86.

III. Held in the beginning of September, 747, in the presence of Ethelbald, king of the Mercians, Cuthbert of Canterbury presiding; eleven bishops and several priests attended. Two letters from pope Zachary were read, after which thirty canons were drawn up.

1. Charges every bishop to be ready to defend his pastoral charge, and the canonical institutions of the Church of Christ, with his utmost endeavors, and to be an example of good, not of worldliness, to his people, and to preach sound doctrine.

2. Exhorts bishops to unity and charity among themselves, so that, however far distant in sees, they may yet be joined together in mind by one spirit, serving God in faith, hope, and charity, and praying for each other.

3. Orders annual episcopal visitations, and directs the bishop to call the people of every condition together to convenient places, and to plainly teach them, and forbid them all pagan and superstitious observances, etc.

4. Directs bishops to exhort all abbots and abbesses within their dioceses to exhibit a good example in their lives, and to rule well their houses.

5. Orders bishops to visit those monasteries which, owing to the corruption of the times, were governed by laymen.

6. Directs due inquiry to be made concerning the good life and sound faith of candidates for priest's orders.

7. Directs bishops, abbots, and abbesses to take care that their "families" do incessantly apply their minds to reading.

8. Exhorts priests to the right discharge of their duty; to desist from secular business; to serve at the altar with the utmost application; carefully to preserve the house of prayer and its furniture; to spend their time in reading, celebrating masses, and psalmody, etc.

9. Exhorts priests, in the places assigned to them by their bishops, to attend to the duties of the apostolical commission, in baptizing, teaching, and visiting, and carefully to abstain from all wicked and ridiculous conversation.

10. Directs that priests should learn how to perform, according to the lawful rites, every office belonging to their order; that they shall also learn to construe and explain in their native tongue the Lord's Prayer and Creed, and the sacred words used at mass and in holy baptism; that they shall understand the spiritual signification of the sacraments, etc.

11. Relates to the faith held by priests, orders that it shall be sound and sincere, and that their ministrations shall be uniform; that they shall teach all men that "without faith it is impossible to please God;" that they shall fulfill the creed into them, and propose it to infants and their sponsors.

12. Forbids priests "to prate in church," and "to dislocate or confound the composure and distinction of the sacred words" by theatrical pronunciation; directs them to follow the "plain song" according to the custom of the Church; or, if they cannot do that, simply to read the words. Also forbids priests to presume to interfere in episcopal functions.

13. Orders the due observation of the festivals of our Lord and Saviour, and of the nativity of the saints, according to the Roman martyrology.

14. Orders the due observance of the Lord's day.

15. Orders that the seven canonical hours of prayer be diligently observed.

16. Orders that the Litanies or rogations be kept by the clergy and people, with great reverence, on St. Mark's day, and on the three days preceding Ascension day.

17. Orders the observance of the "birthdays" of pope Gregory, of St. Augustine of Canterbury, who "first brought the knowledge of faith, the sacrament of baptism, and the notice of the heavenly country," to the English nation.

18. Orders the observance of the ember fasts in the fourth, seventh, and tenth months, according to the Roman ritual.

19. Relates to the behavior and dress of monks and nuns.

20. Charges bishops to take care that monasteries, as their name imports, be honest retreats for the silent and quiet, not receptacles for verifiers, harpers, and buffoons; forbids too much familiarity with laymen, especially to nuns; bids the latter not spend their time in filthy talk, junketing, drunkenness, luxury, nor in making vestments of divers and variegated colors, but rather in reading books and singing psalms.

21. Enjoins all monks and ecclesiastics to avoid the sin of drunkenness, and forbids them to help themselves to drink before three in the afternoon, except in cases of necessity.

22. Admonishes monks and ecclesiastics to keep themselves always prepared to receive the holy communion.

23. Encourages boys among the laity to receive frequently the communion, while they are not yet corrupted; also bachelors and married men who avoid sin, lest they grow weak for want of the salutary meat and drink.

24. Orders that laymen be well tried before they be admitted into the ecclesiastical state, or into monasteries.

25. Relates to almsgiving.

26. Relates to psalmody, as used for the cure of the soul, and as a satisfaction for sin.

27. Forbids to receive greater numbers into monasteries than can be maintained; relates to the dress of monks and nuns.

28. Forbids clerks, monks, and nuns to dwell with lay persons.

29. Enjoins, among other things, that prayer be made by all monks and ecclesiastics for kings and dukes, and for the safety of all Christian people.

See Labbe, Concil. vi, 1565; Wilkins, Concil. i, 94.

IV. Held in 794, called "Synodale Concilium," and "Sanctum Concilium;" two grants are extant made there (Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus, p. 164-167; Haddan and Stubbs, Counc. iii. 483-485).

V. Held in 798, referred wrongly by Spelman to 800: some charters were passed there (Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus, p. 175, 186, 1019; Haddan and Stubbs, Counc. iii. 512-518).

There are intimations also of the annual synod having been held, but without mention of the place (e. g. 704, and 736 or 737, both Mercian councils, and again, 755, Haddan and Stubbs, Counc. iii. 267, 337, 390), which may easily, therefore, have been Clovesho, and probably was so.

VI. Held in 800, by Athelhard, archbishop of Canterbury, in the presence of Kenulf, king of the Mercians. Laws were made for the preservation of Church property, and the faith of the Church declared to be substantially the same as that delivered by St. Augustine. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 1153; Wilkins, Concil. i, 162.

VII. Held Oct. 12, 803, by Athelhard of Canterbury, with twelve bishops of his province, and four priest abbots. The object of this council was to settle the primacy finally at Canterbury, and to restore the dioceses which had been taken from that province by king Offa and pope Adrian, viz. Lichfield, Worcester, Leicester, Sida Chester (probably Hattfield, in Lincolnshire), Hereford, Helman (probably Elmham, in Norfolk), and Thetford. All these sees had been united to make a province for the archbishop of Lichfield, who at this time was Adulf. Leo III, upon his attaining the popedom, favored the request of king Kenulf and Athelhard, that the dismembered dioceses should be restored to the archbishopric of Canterbury, which was finally done in this council, which Adulf himself attended. It was decreed, "that the see archiepiscopal, from this time forward, should never be in the monastery of Lichfield, nor in any other place but the city of Canterbury, where Christ's Church is, and where the Catholic faith first shone forth in this island." The deed is signed by Athelhard and twelve bishops, each making beside his signature the sign of the cross. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 1189; Wilkins, Concil. i, 166.

VIII. Held in 822. Knulf, king of Mercia, having forcibly seized some of the Church lands in Kent, threatening the archbishop Wulfred with banishment in case of resistance, gave them to his daughter Wendriha, abbess of Winchcombe, in Gloucestershire. After the death of Knulf, Wulfred was enabled to obtain redress, and in this council the property of the Church was restored. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 1527; Wilkins, Concil. i, 172.

IX. Held in 824. In this council the difference which had existed between Herbert of Worcester and the monks of Berkeley, concerning the monastery of Westbury, was settled; the monastery being surrendered to the bishop. The decree, dated Oct. 30, was signed by the king, twelve bishops, four abbots, the pope's deputy, and several lords. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 1555; Wilkins, Concil. i, 175.

Clovio, GIULIO GIORGIO (called Il Macedone), a very eminent miniature painter of Croatia, was born in 1498. He was educated for the Church, but was discharged from the priesthood by a dispensation from the pope. After learning the elements of design in his own country, he visited Rome and entered the school of Giulio Romano. He executed an immense number of works, which are highly valued. The most celebrated are The Procession of Corpus Domini, at Rome, painted in twenty-six pictures; and at Milan, in the Cistercian convent, a Descent from the Cross. He died in 1578. See Chalmers, Biographical Dictionary, s. v.; Spooner, Biographical History of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Clow, James, a Scotch clergyman, a native of Ardoch, was licensed to preach in 1813; appointed chaplain to the East India Company at Bombay in 1815, and ordained; resigned in 1833; returned to Scotland; emigrated to Melbourne; was first moderator of the Presbyterian Church of Victoria, Australia, after the Union in 1859, and died soon afterwards. See Fæsti Eccles. Scotticæ, i, 155.

Clow, Patrick, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at the University of St. Andrews in 1701; was licensed to preach in 1711; presented to the living at Leslie in 1713, and died in November, 1781, aged about fifty years. See Fæsti Eccles. Scotticæ, ii, 550.

Clowes, Francis, an English Baptist preacher and educator, was born at Heacham, Norfolk, Jan. 10, 1805. He studied at Bristol College, from which he went to Aberdeen, Scotland. In 1831 he was called to the pastorate of the Thrinell Street Church in Bristol, and about five years afterwards was appointed classical tutor in Horton College, a position which he held fifteen years. He died suddenly, May 7, 1873. Mr. Clowes did much with his pen in promoting Baptist periodical literature, and was one of the editors of The Freeman for several years. "He was ardent and impassioned in his attachment to Baptist principles." See Cathcart, Baptist Encyclop. p. 236. (J. C. S.)

Clowes, John, an English clergyman, was born at Manchester, Oct. 31, 1743, and was a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1769 he was made rector of St. John's Church, Manchester, and in 1773 became one of the first English disciples of Swedenborg, whose doctrines he was active in promoting, although he retained his rectorship for almost sixty years. He died at Leamington, May 29, 1831, leaving Restoration of Pure Religion, two volumes of Sermons, and translated Swedenborg's Arcana Cælestia, and other works.

Clowes, Timothy, LL.D., an Episcopal divine and scholar, graduated at Columbia College in 1808. He became president of Washington College, Md., in 1823, and was for many years a prominent educator, as well as a distinguished mathematician. He died at Hempstead, L. I., in 1847. See Drake, Dict. of Am. Biog. s. v.

Clowet. See CLOURT.

Cloyd, Ezekiel, a Cumberland Presbyterian minister, was born in Montgomery County, Va., Feb. 12, 1760. In 1789 he moved with his parents to North Carolina, and about 1800 settled in Tennessee, and became connected with the Church in Shiloh, Sumner County. He was licensed to preach by the Nashville Presbytery in 1814, and in July, 1822, was ordained at Sugg's Creek. After his ordination he travelled as a circuit-rider for several years. A short time he was pastor of Stoner's Creek congregation, within the bounds of which he spent the most of his life. When not travelling as a minister he was busily occupied on his farm. He died in Lebanon, Tenn., in August, 1851. See Beard, Biographical Sketches, 1st series, p. 192.

Clubbe, John, rector of Wheatfield and vicar of Debenham in Suffolk, England, was the son of Rev. George Clubbe, of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, and was born in 1703. He graduated from King's Hall in 1725, and lost his sight some time before his death, March 2, 1773. He is the author of a single Sermon:—History and Antiquities of Wheatfield (1758):—and of the ironical pieces, Physiognomy, and Free Advice to a Young Clergyman (1763).

Clubbe, William, vicar of Brandeston, Suffolk, England, was the son of the preceding, and died in 1814 having published some lyrical pieces.

Cludius, HERMAN HEIMART, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Hildesheim, March 28, 1754. In 1777 he was preacher of St. George's at his native place, in 1787 superintendent and member of consistory, and died in 1803. He wrote, Wahrheit der Christlichen Religion Inbesondere zur Widerlegung der Juden (Bremen, 1782):—Urnsichten des Christenthums nebst Untersuchung über Einige Bücher des Neuen Testaments (Altona, 1808):—Muhammed's Religion aus dem Koran Dargelegt, Erläutert und Beurtheilt (ibid. 1809):—Betrachtungen über die Gesammten Lehren der Religion (Bremen, 1783-87, 4 vols.). See Zuchold, Hibl. Theol. i, 231; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 181; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 294, 528; ii, 173, 817. (B. P.)

Cluge, CHRISTIAN GOTTLIEB, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1700 at Nerichau, near Grimma. He studied at Wittenberg; was in 1721 magister; in 1729 archidiaconus at Wittenberg; in 1737 doctor of theology there, and died in 1759, leaving De Antiquitate et Origine Rituum Interrogandi Infantes ante Baptismum. (Frankenhause, 1729):—De usu Formulæ. quæ Interrogamus Infantes ante Baptismum de Fide (Wittenberg, 1734):—Comm. de Baptismo Adami (ibid. 1747):—De Interpretatione Prophetiæ Propriam Ipsius Scripturam Dissolvende (ibid. 1754, 1757). Clugniacs. We add the following particulars:

"The chief peculiarity of their churches in France was a large ante-church for penitents. The transept was usually without aisles; but St. Bernard, in 1147, inveighed against the luxury, the enormous height, excessive breadth, empty space, and sumptuous ornament of their churches. The dress of the order was a black frock, a pelisse, a hood of lamb's wool, red hose, a white woollen tunic, and black scapular: and in choir, copes of linen: in cloister and refectory, a white pall; and in times of labor a white scapular. Their first churches, like those of Cistercians, were dedicated to St. Mary; their rule was a composition of those of St. Benedict and St. Augustine. They prohibited the use of organs, and all superfluous carving and pictures, but allowed painted crosses of wood. In England their churches were very irregular in plan. At length they became the most luxurious order in their mode of living; and Peter of Clugny upbraids them with their extravagance in no measured terms. Some of their monasteries were double, composed of men and women. The early peculiarities of their rule were, the dipping of the eucharist in the chalice; the use of furs for the sick or delicate; admission of novices before a year's probation; the reception of a fugitive monk after three cases of offence; absence of manual labor, and the custom for abbots to dine always with the brethren. The Clugniacs wore a cowl of scarlet cloth, to show their readiness to shed their blood for the sake of Christ. They slept in their shirts. They had three or four courses at dinner, two being regarded as a caritas, and shared among two monks; electuaries, spiced and perfumed, and delicate cooking were used; the abbot entertained his guests, and any monks whom he invited, in the hall. Women might enter the monastery; and convents of nuns were placed under the rule of the abbots; the bishop appointed and deposed them, and acted as visitor in difficult cases. No manual labor was practiced, and conversation was freely allowed. The churches were beautifully and richly adorned; incense was much used, and the ceremonial was elaborate. The guests' feet were not washed, but in the three poor men were admitted to the lavanda. After vigils they returned to sleep in their dormitory. Their houses were built in populous places."

Clugny, Ferri de, bishop of Tournay, cardinal and counsellor of the duke of Burgundy, was engaged by that prince in important missions, and died at Rome in 1483. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clugny, François de, a French theologian, was born at Aigues-Mortes, Sept. 4, 1637. He joined the Congregation of the Oratory at the age of fourteen, and was ordained priest at Easter in 1662. He was struck with total blindness, from which, however, he recovered after some time, so that, though not without difficulty, he could again read and write. He began preaching, but died at Dijon, Oct. 21, 1694. He published several works on practical religion, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clugny, Guillaume de, a French prelate, brother of Ferri, accomplished, like him, important missions under Philip the Good and Charles the Bold, dukes of Burgundy, and, after the death of the latter, went over to the service of Louis XI, of France, who made him bishop of Poitiers in 1479. He died at Tours the year following. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Clugston, William, A.M., a Scotch clergyman, a native of Glasgow, was licensed to preach in 1816; presented to the living at Forfar in 1817, and ordained. He joined the Free Secession in 1843, and died March 3, 1857, aged sixty-three years. Mr. Clugston published a sermon on National Judgments (1837), and another on The Widow and the Fatherless (1854). See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 762, 763.

Clulow, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Rushton, Staffordshire, March 22, 1818. He was appointed to the ministry in 1841, set apart to promote the success of Sunday-schools in 1864, and continued in that work for eleven years, contributing by his unflinching assiduity and marked ability much towards the efficiency of the Wesleyan Sunday and day schools. In 1875 he resumed circuit work, in which he was engaged until his death, which occurred at Plymouth, Dec. 18, 1879. Strict attention to duty, conscientious observance of the details of the work, allegiance to law, his amiability, manliness, and sincerity, made his life influential for good. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1880, p. 21.

Clulow, Thomas, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Macclesfield, March 6, 1833. He was called to the ministry in 1856, and died at Southwark, London, Jan. 22, 1869. His ministry was very successful. His life was pure, gentle, becoming. Affable manners, pastoral diligence, especially among the sick and the poor, endeared him to all. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1869, p. 18.

Clulow, William Benton, an English Congregational minister, was born at Leek in 1802, and educated at Hoxton Academy. He first settled at Shaldon, Devonshire, where he remained twelve years, and then, in 1835, became classical tutor in Airedale College, Bradford. After eight years he resigned his position in the college, and lived in retirement the rest of his life, engaged in literary labors. In 1875 he removed to Leek, where he died, April 16, 1882. His published works include, Truths in Few Words:—Aphorisms and Reflections:—Essays of a Recluse:—Sunshine and Shadow. He also left a volume of MS. notes on the Greek New Test. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1883, p. 269.

Clunie, David, a Scotch clergyman, took his degree at Glasgow University in 1672; was bursar of divinity from 1673 to 1676; probationer at the first meeting of the Presbyterians after their liberty in 1687; appointed to the living at Cockburnspath in 1689; member of the general assemblies of 1690 and 1692, and died Nov. 29, 1700, aged forty-seven years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 371.

Clunie, John (1), a Scotch clergyman, was licensed to preach in 1731; presented by the king to the living at Whitekirk in 1732; admitted to the united parish in 1761, and died June 17, 1784, aged seventy-five years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 386.

Clunie, John (2), LL.D., an English Congregational minister, was born in London, April 9, 1784. He was converted in early life, in 1803 entered Hoxton Academy, and studied during two sessions at the University of Glasgow. In 1808 he returned to England, and was ordained at Guildford the following year. His later years were diligently employed in various benevolent enterprises. He died June 23, 1858. Dr. Clunie published, The Storm Improved:—The Path of Life:—A Scripture Diary; and various Sermons on special occasions. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1859, p. 194.

Clunie, John (3), a Scotch clergyman, was precursor at Markinch; licensed to preach in 1784; presented to the living at Ewes in 1790; transferred to Borthwick in 1791; was also chaplain to the second regiment of Mid-Lothian Volunteer Infantry, and died April 14, 1819, aged sixty-one years. He was gifted with a powerful, musical voice, and was extremely fond of singing. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, i, 268, 637.

Clunies, Patrick, a Scotch clergyman, a native of Ross, took his degree at King's College, Aberdeen, in 1662; was admitted to the living at Wick in 1682, and died in 1691, aged about forty-nine years. See Fasti Eccles. Scotiæ, iii, 370.

Clup, William McKendree, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Warren County, Ky., Dec. 5, 1831. He removed to Missouri in 1845; professed religion in 1849; emigrated to California in 1854; was licensed to preach in 1857, and in 1858 admitted into the Pacific Conference, wherein he labored with great zeal, energy, and self-denial until his death, March 11, 1870. He was a sweet singer, an earnest preacher, and a faithful pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South, 1870, p. 515.

Clustered Column, in architecture, is a combination of several shafts to form one pillar.

Clydai, a Welsh saint of the 5th century, is the reputed foundress of a church named Clydai, in Emllyn. See Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 151.

Clydog (or Cledog), a Welsh saint of the 5th century, was buried at Clodock Church, in Herefordshire, of which he was the reputed founder. He was also patron of the chapels of Llanfeuno (St. Benno), Longtown (St. Peter), and Cresswell (St. Mary). He is commemorated Aug. 19. See Rees, Welsh Saints, p. 145.

Cnopf, Ernst Friedrich Andreas, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 21, 1752, at Nuremberg. He studied at Altdorf, and was in 1780 morning preacher at Nuremberg. In 1784 he accepted a call as pastor of the Lutheran Church at Vienna, and died April 3, 1789. He published some Sermons. See Döring, Die Gelehrten theologen Deutschlands, i, 259. (B. P.)

ADDENDUM.

Canada, DOMINION OF.—We here bring down this article to the present date.

I. Secular.—1. General.—This confederation of provinces has almost completed the first quarter of a century of its existence. The census has been taken during the present year, 1891; and an estimate of the present population, made at Ottawa, places it at 5,250,000. The net public debt was, on June 30, 1889, $237,530,042.

In 1886, the Canadian Pacific Railway was opened for passengers, and has made accessible for settlement an enormous territory of the richest agricultural and mineral resources, and of scenery surpassing in natural grandeur the famous countries of Europe. Towns have sprung up along the line with great rapidity, and commerce has opened up the resources of the ancient East for the benefit of the Dominion. Population on the Pacific coast has increased, and legal steps have been taken to found a university where, five years ago, a normal school was impossible.

2. Commerce.—The tonnage of Canada for the year ending on the 30th of June, 1889, was 16,054,221. Her exports were $89,189,167, and her imports, $115,224,931. Her exports to Britain were $38,088,051, and to the United States, $38,490,571. The year 1868 showed exports to the value of $57,567,888, and imports, $73,459,644.

The railway mileage of Canada on June 30, 1889, was 13,741 miles, placing her sixth on the list of nations in this respect.

New regulations place the interest on deposits in the Post-office Savings Bank at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; and deposits may range from 25 cents to \$3000.

3. Literary and Artistic.—The Royal Society of Canada, founded by the Marquis of Lorne, recognises and promotes literary eminence. It has four departments—French, English, mathematics, with physics and chemistry, and geology, with biology. The Royal Academy of Arts, founded by the Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise, does the same work for art.

II. Ecclesiastical.—1. Church of England.—Up to August 15, 1890, the dioceses of this Church were not consolidated into one united whole. At a conference held in St. John's College, Winnipeg, on that date, a scheme for the formation of a general synod, to include the whole church of British North America, was adopted. This synod will consist of the bishops of the Church of England in Canada and Newfoundland, with clerical and lay delegates, chosen by the diocesan synods, where they exist, or appointed by the bishop of a diocese without a synod. Dioceses with fewer than 25 licensed clergymen send one delegate of each order; those with from 25 to 49 clergymen, inclusive, two such delegates; those with from 50 to 99, three such delegates; and those with 100 clergymen and upwards, four such delegates.

The synod shall have two houses—the upper, composed of the bishops, and the lower, composed of clergy and laity—each to sit separately, except by unanimous consent. The primate of the General Synod shall be elected by the upper house from the metropolitans. He shall hold office for life, or so long as he remains bishop of any included diocese, though he may resign. The General Synod shall deal with any matters affecting the whole Church, such as doctrine, worship, discipline; all agencies for promoting church work, missionary or educational; the adjustment between dioceses of funds for clergy, widows and orphans, and superannuation; the transfer of clergy between dioceses; the training of candidates for holy orders; the constitution and powers of a court of appeal; and the erection, division, and rearrangement of provinces. The expenses of the synod, including travelling expenses of members, shall be met by an assessment of the dioceses proportionate to their representation, dioceses having only one delegate of each order being exempt. The first meeting of the General Synod is appointed for Toronto, the second Wednesday in September, 1893, and is to be convened by the metropolitan senior by consecration.

The Church of England in Canada has 20 dioceses and 20 bishops, about 450,000 members, 1019 clergymen. Her contributions, for the year ending July 31, 1890, for domestic and foreign missions, were $37,968.33, those for foreign missions alone being $15,190.40. She has 3 missionaries in Japan. Foreign missions include work among Chinese and other pagan races in Canada.

A college for boys ("Ridley College") has been founded in St. Catharines, Ontario, for the interests of Evangelical Protestants in the Church.

2. Presbyterians.—The Presbyterian Church of Canada has 5 synods, those of the Maritime Provinces, Montreal and Ottawa, Toronto and Kingston, Hamilton and London, Manitoba and the North-west Territories, besides the Presbytery of Indore, in India, with synodical powers; the presbytery of Honan, in China, and that of Trinidad, embracing 43 home and 3 foreign presbyteries. Besides these, there is the New Hebrides mission. The communicants number 171,240, of whom 6475 are on missions. There are 1039 ministers, including ordained missionaries.

The missions are among French Canadians, American Indians, in India, China, Trinidad, and the New Hebrides. The latter has 3 ministers as missionaries. Trinidad has 6. China has 8 Canadian and 2 native missionaries, besides a medical missionary, 2 nurses, with 50 native preachers and teachers. India has 5 ministers, 8 ladies and numerous other agents engaged in mission work, and at Indore College. Seven ordained missionaries are among the American Indians, and 37 among the French Canadians. There are 36 mission schools, 26 mission churches, and 92 stations for the French, with 1337 members.

One of the schools is at St. Anne, in Illinois. There are 5853 elders; Sunday scholars and those in Bible classes number 128,886. Workers in such schools number 15,441. The volumes in libraries are 197,998. Those who attend prayer-meetings number 50,661. Scholars who commit Scripture to memory are 60,865. Those who commit the Shorter Catechism are 67,555.

The income for all purposes, in 1890, was $2,054,561, which, with $38,327 from mission stations, gives a total of $2,093,278. The amount paid for stipends in 1890 was $800,209; to the college fund, $56,259; and to mission funds, $177,695.

A regular system of examinations, by paper, with examiners, sub-examiners, prizes and diplomas, for Sunday scholars exists. The ages of candidates range from 10 to 25 years. The value of each paper is 200, of which 50 per cent. passes, from 75 to 90 per cent. gains a book prize, and 90 per cent. gains a silver medal. The time for each paper is two hours. Examinations are simultaneous at all centres.

3. Methodists.—In this Church, only one general superintendent is now employed.

During the four years ending with September, 1890, the number of probationers for the ministry has increased from 208 to 296; of ministers, from 1610 to 1748; of local preachers and exhorters, from 2692 to 3142; of class-leaders, from 6641 to 7143; of members, from 197,469 to 233,868.

The infant baptisms for the same period have been 63,795, and the adult, 11,307.

There are 12 annual conferences, 3173 Sunday-schools, 28,411 Sunday-school officers and teachers, 226,050 scholars, 37,158 scholars in class, 25,677 children learning the catechism, 49,419 scholars pledged against liquors and tobacco, those against intoxicants alone being 41,522, and 217,888 volumes in libraries. There are 3092 churches, 1168 other preaching places, and 967 parsonages. The value of Church property is $11,597,491.

There are 2 weekly newspapers, 1 monthly, 1 quarterly, 8 Sunday-school papers, of which 2 are weekly.

The amount invested in publishing interests is $504,316. The capital of the Book House in Toronto is $256,370.05.

There are 14 colleges and other educational institutions, 157 professors and teachers, 3157 college graduates, and 3522 college students. Value of institutions, $1,048,700.

There are 473 mission stations, 507 missionaries, 96 native assistants and teachers, 4265 members on mission stations, 4265 Indian members, 358 auxiliaries of the Women's Missionary Society, 8584 members of these auxiliaries, 4462 members of Mission Bands, and about 200 Epworth Leagues, with about 15,000 members.

During the aforesaid quadrennium, an annual conference has been established in Japan, and the membership there has grown from 591 to 1716; the contributions, from yen 903.04 to 6491.35; the value of Church property from yen 28,085 to 64,843, and the Sunday scholars from 542 to 1486.

Work has been undertaken among the Chinese in British Columbia, at Victoria, Vancouver, New Westminster, and Kamloops.

The missionary income has increased from $201,874.34 to $220,026.43. Contributions for all purposes amounted to $8,063,967.

The course of study for probationers not attending college has been improved, and Greek has been inserted as one of the requirements.

The relation of attendance upon class-meeting to membership in the Church has been placed upon the same basis as that upon other means of grace.

A movement which is likely greatly to affect the future of Canadian Methodism is the contemplated removal of her leading university, Victoria College, from Cobourg to Toronto, the affiliation of that college with the Provincial University of Toronto, and the renunciation by Victoria of her right to grant degrees, except in divinity, during the continuance of such confederation.

The scheme for this confederation was carried in 1886, and was confirmed in 1890 by the General Conference.

In 1882, Victoria and Albert universities were united. The varied claims of University College, in Toronto, and the denominational colleges led to a scheme for the consolidation of all the universities of Ontario as colleges under one provincial university. Certain branches of study were to be allotted to a university professoriate, so as to relieve the colleges of work. These branches, which may, under certain circumstances, be changed, are pure mathematics, physics, astronomy, geology, mineralogy, chemistry, zoology, botany, physiology, ethnology, comparative philology, history, logic, metaphysics, history of philosophy, Italian, Spanish, political economy, civil polity, jurisprudence, constitutional law, and engineering.

The lectures of this professoriate are to be free to all matriculated students of confederated colleges, and will include, as optional subjects, Biblical Greek and literature, Christian ethics, apologetics, the evidences of natural and revealed religion, and Church history.

Trinity College, of the Church of England, from dissatisfaction with the financial and educational provisions of the proposed scheme, refused to confederate. Queen's College, of the Presbyterians, from inability to comply with the requirement that confederating colleges must remove to Toronto, the need of a university in Eastern Ontario, and from the benefits of separate universities, as seen in Scotland, Germany, the United States, and even England, also refused confederation. The Baptists also refused, and erected McMaster Hall into a university, with an arts course, as well as one in theology.

The Methodists alone have decided to sink their leading university into a confederated college. Under this scheme, Victoria College secures five acres of University Park, at a nominal rental of one dollar a year while it remains confederated, and proposes to erect buildings at a cost of $135,000. Opposition to the scheme was removed by a bequest, from William Gooderham, Esq., of Toronto, of $200,000, conditioned on such federation and removal from Cobourg. Until the completion of the new buildings, degrees will be conferred by Victoria College only by special arrangements.

The union of the Methodists of Canada has been followed by the appearance of a new denomination, called the Free Methodist Church of Canada, with 5 conference officers and 17 ministers.

Two churches of colored Methodists still retain their separate existence, one with 17 and the other with 21 ministers.

4. Congregationalists.—This body has two unions, that of Ontario and Quebec and that of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. It reports 126 churches, 70 other preaching stations, 91 ministers, 5 district associations, 1 college, 1 missionary to Japan, and 10,245 members; 184 church buildings, valued at $782,700, and parsonages to the value of $69,150.

The doctrinal statement omits from the Apostles' Creed the passage about the descent into hell.

Financial difficulties have led to the resignation of the missionary superintendent.

The Foreign Missionary Society was originated in 1881. Two missionaries are in Africa, and one, a lady, at Bombay. The income of the Missionary Society has increased in 8 years, to June 4, 1890, from $4000 to $15,728.73.

The Indian mission at French Bay has been given over to the Methodists.

The debts on Church property in Ontario and Quebec are $180,205. The alumni of the college number 109. The salary of the professor of Hebrew and Greek exegesis is $600 a year. The contributions to the college amount to $1.00 for each member of the Church from Quebec, 20 cents a member from Ontario, and 6½ cents from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The expenses exceeded the income by $900 a year from 1887 to 1889. There are 9 professors and lecturers, at salaries amounting to $3400. This college receives $1207.28 from the Colonial Missionary Society of England. The endowment is $32,997.83.

The branches of the Provident Fund for Widows and Orphans and Retired Ministers has a capital of $19,774.06. The free contributions to this fund show a growing decrease.

5. Baptists.—This denomination is divided into two groups—those of Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba and the North-west Territories and those of the Maritime Provinces. For the sake of convenience, they may be called the Western and the Eastern Baptists. The Western have 285 ministers, 33,252 members, and 2930 persons were baptized during the year 1890, with 19 associations, 28,824 Sunday scholars, 3408 officers and teachers, and 9 publications.

The amount expended on Sunday-schools was, in 1890, $12,734.67. In the foreign mission field, among the Telugus, are 11 churches, 11 missionaries, and 60 assistants. Six new workers have gone forth during 1890—two men and their wives, one lady, and one artist who proposes to paint, for his support, during part of the year, and to spend the remainder in mission work.

For the support of missions, Ontario is divided into 17 associations and 147 sub-circles.

There is one university, called McMaster, from the founder, with 4 colleges connected with it—Woodstock College, Moulton Ladies' College, the Toronto Arts College, and the Theological College. The assets available for college purposes are $989,437.37.

The Canadian Baptist realizes a profit, but the book-room is maintained at a loss.

There was raised for all purposes, in 1890, $304,635.01. During that year, 12 churches were dedicated.

A superintendent of missions has been appointed, after the former example of the Congregationalists and the present example of the Presbyterians.

The Eastern Baptists have 8 associations, 389 churches, 41,480 members, and have had 1171 baptisms during the year ending May 31, 1890. They have 498 Sunday-schools, 29,333 scholars, and 2651 teachers and officers. Of the scholars, 474 were baptized during the year above mentioned.

They have, as educational institutions, Acadia College, Horton Academy, and Acadia Seminary, with Chipman Hall.

They have expended, for the year ending August, 1890, $15,053.88 for foreign missions, and $7616.59 for home missions.

The number of Baptist churches in all Canada is 850, with 78,497 members.

The arts department of McMaster University was opened Oct. 10, 1890.

6. Roman Catholics.—The following statistics are taken from Le Canada Ecclésiastique, Almanach-annuaire pour l'Année 1891. This Church has seven ecclesiastical provinces, those of Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Kingston, Halifax, and St. Boniface; 24 dioceses; 2 apostolic vicariates, those of Athabaska-Mackenzie and Pontiac; 1 apostolic prefecture, that of the Gulf of St. Lawrence; 21 communities of men and 38 of women; 1,988,142 adherents, 2284 priests, 379 convents, and 51 colleges and schools.

The Jesuits have 14 establishments in Canada, with 230 so-called religious persons (religieux), all Canadians, except 16 who are Europeans. The Provincial House was founded in 1842, on the 1st of June, by Father Felix Martin, who was the first rector of it. He had five companions. There are colleges in Montreal and St. Boniface. The fathers and novices are scattered through the dioceses of Montreal, Quebec, Ottawa, Hamilton, Peterboro, and St. Boniface.

There is one cardinal, who is also archbishop of Quebec, and six other archbishops, 22 bishops, and one apostolic prefect. One of these bishops, Monseigneur Bégin, of Chicoutimi, is the author of a work, Holy Scripture and the Rule of Faith, of which the boast is made that it has never been answered. It proceeds from the ordinary evangelical arguments on the Scriptures to the Roman conclusions.

The Victoria Medical School, the medical department of the Methodist Victoria University, has been brought into connection with the Laval University.

The long-existing claims of the Roman Catholic Church to the forfeited Jesuit estates have been settled. Christianity.

by the grant to the Church by the Provincial government of $400,000, and to the Protestants of $60,000, for educational purposes. The Romanists succeeded, also, in obtaining a grant of a large common at Laprairie, near Montreal. A succinct account of this transaction, from an authorized source, is as follows: Prior to the English occupation of Canada, the Jesuits had obtained, by grants from the kings of France, by gifts from citizens, and by purchase, lands in Quebec, Montreal, and Three Rivers. When the English took Canada in 1759, the Jesuits were incorporated. In 1773, Pope Clement XIV. abolished them. In 1800, George III. issued a warrant confiscating these lands to the Crown, by right of conquest. The government took them in 1856, and the greater part of them remained with the government in 1867. From 1800 to 1867, the Roman clergy protested that these estates belonged to the Church, as confiscation by conquest was contrary to the actual civil laws and to the Treaty of Paris. In 1874 and 1875, the greater part of the estates were given to the province of Quebec, except the Champ de Mars in Montreal, still held by the Dominion government. In 1876, M. Mercier, the Quebec premier, found a formal promise of the government to settle the question. This promise was registered in Rome and Canada. The pope commanded M. Mercier to have the property restored. This, however, in a mixed community, was declared to be impossible. Both political parties agreed to a compromise, the payment to the Roman Church of $400,000, and to the Protestants of $60,000, for education. The act by which this was effected was passed on July 3, 1888. The estates were valued at from $400,000 to $2,000,000.

While successful in this, the Roman Church has been defeated in Manitoba, where separate schools have been by law abolished. The law has been confirmed on appeal.

7. Minor Bodies.—The Evangelical Association returns 76 ministers; the Universalists, 9 ministers and 402 members; the United Brethren, 23 ministers; the Evangelical Lutherans, 53 ministers; the Reformed Episcopal Church, 24; and the New Jerusalem Church, 8.

8. Manitoba and the North-west Territories.—The census of 1886 gives, in Manitoba, 14,651 Roman Catholics, 23,206 Church of England, 28,406 Presbyterians, 18,648 Methodists, and 3296 Baptists.

The census of 1885 for the North-west Territories gives 9301 Romanists, 9976 Church of England, 712 Presbyterians, 6910 Methodists, and 778 Baptists.

9. As a conclusion to the ecclesiastical facts in this article, there may be noticed a strong and practical movement towards Christian unity between churches that had hitherto consolidated their own scattered forces. This movement arose in the synod of the diocese of Toronto, of the Church of England, on motion of Rev. James Roy, LL.D., seconded by Rev. Rural Dean Langtry. This was taken up by the Provincial Synod, and has resulted in several meetings of the representatives of the three leading Protestant churches, who have together discussed the possibility of union between them. The chief obstacles are the claims of what is called the "historic episcopate," on the one hand, and the determination to uphold the legitimacy and sacramental efficiency of the non-episcopal ministry, on the other. What is the historic episcopate; whether any variation from it is ever legitimate; under what circumstances it is so, if it is so at all, and on what principles each is imperative, seem to be the chief questions a settlement of which delays the consummation of a union not more difficult than some that have already taken place, and more desirable than any or all of those which now exist.

On the whole, speak well for the Roman Catholics who seek, in this way, to heal what must be called the "unhappy divisions" of our common Christianity.
